As soon as that is done, Dr. Back is told to repair to the East-India House, and that Mr. Sutton and Capt. Anstice will be there as soon as he is. Accordingly on the 2d of May they both proceed from the west end of the town, first to the Monument coffee-house, where Dr. Back had appointed to be present, before all the parties repaired to the India-House to pass this young man. They proceed to the Monument coffee-house, and there they find Dr. Back, and a conversation takes place as to the remaining halves of the two notes, the parties insisting-that is, Andrews and Sutton insisting-that they would have both the halves of the notes delivered to them before they would stir a step further; but Dr. Back, who seems to have some intelligence upon this subject, saying, " No, it is quite sufficient it I trust you with the half of the £300; I will not give you the half of the £500 until the young man is actually passed; we will all go together, and as soon as he is passed the half of the other shall be put into your hands." At last it is so agreed, a considerable discussion having taken place. The half of that note having been delivered to Sutton, who is to apply for the other half to Capt. Anstice, they proceed together to the India-House, and when they come there, the papers then being completed and filled up, they are put into the hands of a clerk, a Mr. Huldane, one of the clerks in the Cadet office, it having been previously arranged and orders given, that the moment the papers came in, they should be handed up to the Committee of Directors. In consequence of that I need not state the young man was mable to pass, and the whole thing is blown up. Sutton is found at an opposite house, very much alarmed, to which Dr. Back goes back. He finds Sutton alone, or Sutton and Andrews together, and stating he should be a ruined man if this matter was discovered, and then stating he was Sutton and giving his direction, and I believe it will appear at a subsequent period that he goes down to Dr. Back to make inquiries. On the same day I should state that Gibbons is found just at the time the parties enter the India-House watching in the office to see what was going on, knowing that the passing of the young man will take place that day, to take a share in the plunder. Dr. Back asks, what do you do here? We have had nothing to do with you for the last six months." Gibbons says, "I come on behalf of myself and Mr. Wright, to get the difference between the sum we first named and the sum you have got it for; for as I told you it would cost 900 guineas and you have got it for £800, there is £145 to spare, and I mean to have the odd £45 and give Wright the £100." That shews the connexion between all the parties from the first to the last.

That, gentlemen, is pretty much the outline of the case against the first seven of the defendants, and upon that evidence, even if it had not been corroborated as it is now, beyond all dispute, by the acts of the parties themselves pleading guilty to the indicrment, and one of them taking a verdict by consent, there could be no doubt in the minds of gentlemen of your intelligence that they were all of them, and not part, guilty of the transaction.

But I come now to state the facts that relate to Mr. Prescott, and I begin by stating that there is not the least charge against him, nor am I instructed to state, that he was guilty of any actual participation in the money given for this appointment. He is charged only with having abused the situation he held by knowing, or at least having certain means of knowledge of, that which had taken place in the course of this transaction by Sutton, and yet lending his aid to it by giving Sutton the patronage so to be disposed of.

Now, what is the exact connexion between Sutton and Mr. Prescott I am not able to trace out; they are friends, and have long been intimate and acquainted. That Sutton is a person who has served Mr. Prescott very much in the course of some elections that have taken place, that I beheve I shall be able to prove, and whether, by having this patronage in his power, Capt. Prescott thinks proper actually to sell it and convert the money to his own use, or whether he thinks proper to give it to a person from whom he has received services and is indebted, that that person may convert it into money and apply it to his own purposes, does not make any material degree of distinction between the parties accused: in either case it is a gross perversion of the purposes for which this public trust is reposed in him, is rather a shade in the degree of guilt, than in the degree of fraud.

But I now proceed to state the evidence that will affect Mr. Prescott. It will appear that on Thursday the 26th April, he made application to another director, Col. Toone, a gentleman who has been a director of the Company for the last thirty years, to lend him, which is by no means an uncommon transaction, an appointment for that year of a cadetship in the Madras cavalry. Col. Toone said he was extremely welcome to it; that no man in England was more welcome to his patronage than Mr. Prescott. This was on Thursday the 26th April, and I have already stated, while I was mentioning the other steps in the transaction, that this was the day immediately following that upon which the £800 had been completely deposited in the city with Gibbons or Capt. Anstice. It seems that on the Friday some conversation had taken place at the East-India House which it is unnecessary for me to state; I only state it as occasioning an act done by Col. Toone; but some conversation took place at the India-House that made Col. Toone uneasy at the promise that he had made to Mr. Prescott to lend him this appointment, and in consequence of that Col. Toone called upon Mr. Prescott, or met him at the India-House, and a conversation ensues that it will be extremely important for you to bear in your minds. You will perceive when this paper is put into your hands, that there is a letter, signed by the party who recommends any young man to the appointment under the East-India Company, in which he states that he declares upon his honour that he received the nomination of cadet for the Madras cavalry from one of the directors gratuitously, and that "I have given it gratuitously to Mr. Edward Drake Back, with whose family and connexions I am well acquainted." There is upon every one of the There is upon every one of the papers, before a cadet can be passed, a letter written by the recommending person to the directors, from which it is called a recommendatory letter, and there is an assertion from this person so recommending, that he is well acquainted with the connexions and the family of the person so recommended to notice; in fact, that is the only security the directors have that their patronage shall not be abused; they know nothing of the young men brought forward, but each individual director knows the person to whom he has given his patronage, and if he can trust him, he sees his name at the bottom of the letter, that he is either the parent of the party, or well acquainted with the party recommended: the only pledge the directors have left that improper persons shall not be admitted into the service of the Company, is this letter of the party so recommending.

Gentlemen, upon this occasion, instead of being signed, as the letter ought to have been, by some person who had actually recommended young Mr. Back to this patronage of the Company, this document is irregularly, and unusually, and therefore I say improperly, signed by Mr. Prescott himself. What does Mr. Prescott assert in this letter? He asserts that young Mr. Back is a person with whose family and connexions he is well acquainted; this is signed by Mr. Prescott at the East. India House on Saturday the 28th of April. I have told you, on Friday after. noon something had occurred to render the mind of Col. Toone uneasy that he had given this offer, and a conversation takes place to which I wish to call your attention. Col. Toone asks Mr. Pres. cott what he knows of young Mr. Back, what he knows of his connexions: the answer given-I wish to give it in the very words—is this, he stated "that he knew the young man's father—that he was a respectable clergyman residing in Devonshire—that the young man wanted only two months to be twenty-two years of age, and that he was as fine a youth as any in England." I am sorry to say, gentlemen, that not one part of this as. sertion is borne out by the fact. Mr. Prescott did not know the father of Mr. Back-he had never seen or heard of the father before this transaction-Dr. Back was not a clergyman in Devonshire for the last twelve years—he had been living abroad, and I believe has not been in Devonshire for a longer period than the twelve years in question—the young man wanted more than two months of twentytwo-he was not at this period more than twenty-one and a half, and this is not an immaterial allegation, because the time at which a young man would be superannuated being twenty-two, the nearer he approaches to that age, the more necessary it is that all due diligence shall be used to procure the appointment; there is the more occasion to look about to see that the young man is provided for; that assertion was one not founded on fact; and when he asserts he is as fine a youth as any in England, I am told that that is by no means a proper and just description of the gentleman; however, he will be called as a witness, and you will see whether that is a proper description of the party; so that you have the letter filled up irregularly by the person who ought not to have subscribed it, but who ought to have insisted on the party who had obtained the recommendation from him to have been the recommendation upon the face of the letter: and who is that party? I have no scruple in saying it is Sutton; the facts of the case shew it was Setton, and Sutton only. Sutton ought to have written this letter, and Mr. Prescott, instead of being the party recommending, ought to have been the nominator; he ought to have been the director nominating, and Sutton the party recom-Why was this alteration? why mending. was not Sutton used as the name? why was not he brought forward on this occasion as the party who recommended the young man? I must draw the inference, young man? I must draw the interiory in making the inference must be interior.

I must say—because a very short period before that, in the month of February, the very same transaction took place, his giving an appointment to Souton, and Suton has signed the recommendatory letter in February before that, and Mr. Prescott had been the nominating director. I say, therefore, you will judge whether the inference is a just one, that the object was not to bring forward the name of Sutton in these papers, that recourse was had to this mode of filling up the paper, and that the ordinary business and regular course of making this appointment was not adopted.

Gentlemen, we have now got to Saturday the 28th, on which day the conversation takes place I have alluded to. the course of the morning of the 28th Mr. Prescott goes or sends to the office of the cadet clerks, Mr. Prescott having a right to do that as all the other directors have. A clerk of the name of Sharp, a person who will be called to you, will state what took place. Mr. Prescott produced this printed paper, filled up in the manner I have stated to you. pause to ask you, how could this paper come into the hands of Mr. Prescott? have shewn, this paper was given by his friend, and former manager in this transaction, to Dr. Back, to be filled up to a certain extent; I have shewn you it was transmitted back to Gibbons, and it is a perfect blank. What becomes of the paper from its reaching Gibbons to its appearing in the hands of Mr. Prescott? Let that be explained. I suppose in explanation of it, that Sutton is the person whom I have shewn to be colleaguing with the others, and one of the parties in the conspiracy, that Sutton must have been the person, who, as he had asked this favour of Mr. Prescott, so he had put this appointment into the hands of Mr. Gibbons: he tells Sharp the manner in which the remaining part shall be filled up, but as if he felt conscious at the moment there was something irregular in this, he says, "but will this be regular?" "No," says the clerk, "that is not regular; the name of the person who solicited the appointment and obtained it from the director, the person who recommends the candidate, the friend of the young man who is recommended to the notice of the director, should be the person to sign it; you ought not to sign it, you are the nominator; and although it is your own, you have borrowed it from Colonel Toone, and you ought to have signed it, and the real party should have nominated him. Shall I make out the paper inthe usual way?" He says "no; I have given Colonel Toone a great deal of trouble, fill it up in the usual way and I with myself," and he signs it; and a written accompanying this and it is to be sent to Colonel Toone at the west end of the town. About nine o'clock in the evening a scaled paper comes containing this which I hold in my hand. containing also a note written in the name of Mr. Abington, who was the head clerk of the office, but who had been absent that day from illness, but in whose name it was written at the express request of Mr. Prescott. A sealed paper enclosing this note and these documents arrives at the house of Colonel Toone. it being necessary for him to make the ultimate signature at the bottom of it, as the party who declares that to his belief all is correct. I have already told you what had taken place in Colonel Toone's mind; he was still so dissatisfied, even that night he writes one note to Mr. Abington at the East India House, requesting that the young man should not pass until he had seen him himself; and he writes another note, which he sent by his own servant to Mr. Prescott, the defendant, telling him he must not bring him to the India-House to pass him until he has seen him, and he is satisfied he is the person represented to be.

Gentlemen, let us follow up this sealed parcel, it takes a very different course from that which was intended; it arrives at Colonel Toone's, and he, after signing it, redirects it to Mr. Abington, the head clerk of the office. An East-India House messenger, who had received his previous instructions, instead of carrying it to Mr. Abington, carries it on to the house of Mr. Prescott, and Mr. Prescott breaks open the seal and obtains possession of this paper. The next day is Sunday, and nothing is done upon this part of the transaction. Ihave already stated on what the other members were occupied on this day: they were calling at Mr. Andrews's private house. Monday morning comes; you recollect the note written to Mr. Prescott, requesting him to attend wfth the young man, and produce him before any thing was done with the papers. On the Monday morning Colonel Toone goes to the India-House; no one appears from Mr. Prescott, nor the young man himself: therefore although Mr. Prescott had received this intimation of the doubt existing on Colonel Toone's mind, and his anxiety that all should be set right before the appointment was ultimately made, he does not do that, which I must say any man who was occupied in a straight-forward course would be most anxious to do, stop these papers, and prevent their being carried through the office, until that explanation had been given to Colonel Toone, the nominator, which he demanded.

Then again on the Tuesday morning I have stated what took place; there is nothing further as to Mr. Prescott, except this, that while the young man is there he calls the young man before him, and asks him how old he is, and whether he likes to go to India; but not a syllable upon that point which ought to have excited a suspicion in his mind, not a word about the party recommending him, or whether it was obtained gratuitously or not; all that which he must have known was passing in the mind of Colonel Toone, and most anxiously passing there, all that is kept back, there is nothing but that simple inquiry.

Gentlemen, these are the facts of the case. Upon the particular circumstances that appear to me to constitute a case against the other defendants I shall not trouble you with a word. These are the facts, which I say appear to me to constitute a case, if not of conviction, at least of such great suspicion against the defendant Mr. Prescott, that I do take on me to say the directors would not have performed their duty to the public if they had not included his name in the present indictment. First, I think it is perfectly clear that a sale had been effected of a cavalry appointment for the sum of £800; that is put beyond all dispute. It is in the next place clear that the party who obtained the advantage of the appointment, obtained it through the means of Mr. Prescott: it is clear he is a stranger to Mr. Prescott, and it is clear that the party who had recommended him to Mr. Prescott had a short time before obtained a similar appointment for another person.

It is clear that Mr. Prescott has signed this recommendatory letter, not in the ordinary course; it is clear that the recommendation to which his name is subscribed contains facts that are not founded in truth; it will be proved to you beyond dispute, that when his particular attention is called to these facts, a conversation takes place between Col. Toone and himself, in which he states his attention being called to it, facts not consistent with the truth; it is clear that the paper which we have traced into the hands of Mr. Gibbons, by some means or other comes into the hands of Mr. Prescott; it is clear that when that paper is sent by itself at night, directed to Col Toone, it gets back into his hands again, not in the mode in which it was intended by Col. Toone, for by him it was directed and addressed, and intended to be passed back to the regular office; but there is at least this fact, which appears to me to afford the most pregnant evidence against him, that when all those suspicions were raised, he knew what Col. Toone's mind was working upon, and when he had it in his power to stop the papers till a satisfactory ex-planation was given, he does not only not keep the appointment back for that purpose, but he allows, as far as he is concerned, the previous paper to pass; it on not necessary to state, that the chairman and directors, and committee, had taken effectual care that the paper should no pass, and that was the course followed.

These are the facts of the case; if any observations I have made do not appear to you to deserve the weight that in my mind I am giving them, you will reject them. If there is any doubt in this case. I am sure I only speak the septiments of the directors in saying, that they would be most happy, if after this full investigation, the name of Mr. Prescott should appear perfectly unconnected with the transaction, and as far as I am concerned, it will give me the greatest pleasure also; but I should have descried the duty that has placed me here, if I had not made the observations that appeared to me fairly to be drawn from the evidence to be brought before you.

The following was the evidence for the prosecution.

The Rev. Edward Back, D.D., examined by Mr. Serj. Bosanquet. Witness resided at Little Hampton; had resided there about a year and a half, or nearly two years; resided before that in various parts of the Continent for fourteen or fitteen years; lived in Devonshire about that time, fourteen or filteen years ago; witness's son was born there. In the autumn of 1826 witness's attention was attracted by an advertisement in the Morning Herald, relating to a good situation for a young man who was inclined to go abroad, a young man under twenty. In consequence of that advertisement witness obtained an interview with the defendant Wright, at his own house, in Allsop's Buildings, near the Regent's Park; witness called upon him.

The witness identified the advertisement, which was read as follows .-

Morning Herald, Friday, Aug. 11, 1826.—" To Parents and Guardians.—A permanent situation of a re-pictable nature now offers for a youth under twenty to go altroad; his outfit would require means, without which none need apply. Address by letter only, post paid, to M. N. 33, Craven Street, Strand."

Examination continued .- Witness called at Allsop's Buildings and saw Mr. Wright; witness called in the name of Col. Edwards. It was intimated to witness that the parent or guardian would not be treat ed with; he was first of all told that no one else would be treated with; witness had cards with the name of Col. Edwards on them. At the time Mr. Wright mentioned the nature of the appointment, and how it was to be obtained, he said £000 or £800 would be necessary; the appointment was to be a cadetship to He said India in the company's service. that it would be £600 if it was in fantry, and £800 or £900 if in the cavalry. This was a little more than twelve months since. Before that time witness had not understood that any price was to be paid for the appointment—quite the contrary, and told Mr. Wright that; after learning that those prices were asked for the appointment, witness broke off the negociation. Witness after this communicated to the chairman of the East-India Company the circumstances that had Witness intended to renew taken place. the negociation, and before he did that he communicated with the chairman of the Company, because circumstances had altered in a pecuniary point of view: witness's son had become of age, and was entitled to a small property of his own. Witness wished to renew the negociation, but before doing so he communicated with the chairman of the Company, because there appeared to be a mystery about it, and he was afraid that all was Witness renewed that negociation at the request of the chairman, after he had told witness the dangerous situction he was likely to be in, and that it was totally against the law. Witness from time to time communicated to the chairman of the East India Company the different steps he took in this transaction. In consequence of that, witness called again at Allsop's Buildings, but did not succeed in seeing Mr. Wright there upon that occasion. Witness did not become acquainted with Mr. Wright's handwriting; witness received a letter (handed to the witness) after he had called at Allsop's Buildings, having left his card in the name of Col. Edwards; it was about two or three days after.

The letter was put in and read as follows, after it had been proved by Mr. Thomas Varley to be in Wright's handwriting.

writing.

**Dated 63, Upper Norton Street, Portland Road, Feb. 27, 1827, addressed by Mr. Wright to Col. Edwards, to the care of the Rev. Dr. Back. Col. Edwards, in the care of the Rev. Dr. Back. Col. Edwards, and begs to say that the opportunity now exists on the care of the Rev. Dr. Back. Dr. Back. Col. Edwards may be considered to the first of the collection of the c

The examination of Dr. Back then continued. Witness called according to that letter, and saw Gibbons, one of the other defendants. Witness firmly believed a letter shown to him to be the hand-writing of Gibbons; witness has corresponded with him. The letter was read as follows:

Monday, 20th of March 1827, addressed to Col. Edwards.
Edwards.
**Mresbons (on the part of Mr. Wright) will Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 142

meet Col. Edwards to-morrow at one o'clock, at 32, Walbrook, having an appointment there at that hour, and as Col. E. has desired this letter to be addressed to the City, it probably may be more convenient to him than Norton Street."

Examination continued. - In consequence of that note witness called at Walbrook on the 6th of March, and on the 8th also. Witness saw Mr. Gibbons at both times, and on both had conversation with him respecting the cadetcy. Gibbons told witness the price of a cadetcy in the infantry was £600, and the cavalry 900 guineas, and that the negociation was to be conducted by depositing money in the hands of any banker, or by cutting bank notes in two. Witness received from him a paper [a paper shewn to witness]. This he gave witness in Walbrook, he believed; however, he gave witness one in Walbrook and some at the cadet office. He gave a blank form at the cadet office and one in Walbrook, and Gibbons told witness to get a certificate of baptism properly filled up, and then return it to him. Witness sent it into the country for the purpose of having it filled up, and returned it filled up to Mr. Gibbons. Gibbons shewed witness other papers respecting the appointment of cadets; he shewed him two different receipts of money that had been paid him. He said it was an acknowledgment to return the half notes in case the promise was not fulfilled. said there was a young man he had just passed who had gone into the country; he had not embarked yet; he was gone to take leave of his friends in Devonshire (witness thought). After witness had returned the paper filled up, he saw Gibbons again frequently. [The witness then proved the receipt of the following letter, in the hand-writing of Gibbons, which was read].

Letter read dated 32. Walbrook, 24th of March 1827, signed G. H. Gibbons, and addressed to Col. Edwards, or Dr. Back.

1827. signed G. H. Gibbons, and addressed to Col. Edwards, or Dr. Back.

"Sir: I received your letter enclosing Mr. Back's certificate, and which I was in hope of cerrying into effect ere this, but it unfortunately arrived a day too late; as what I anticipated when I saw you had been disposed of the day before I received your's. However, I have no doubt of being able in the course of about a fortnight of being in a situation to fulfil your wishes, having made an engagement to that effect. I think I can procure out in the cavalry, but not less than 900 cuness with the cavalry, but not less than 900 cuness will be the process of t

Examination continued .- Witness saw Gibbons again the 12th of April. Witness had been in the mean time in the country. [A paper handed to witness]. Upon the 12th of April witness gave Gibbons a £500 bank note, and he cut it and retained one half and witness the other. Witness received the note from the solicitor of the East-India Company. Gibbons then wrote this receipt in witness' presence.

The same was handed in, and read as follows:

Received the 12th of April 1827, of Dr. Back, the half of a £300 Bank of England note, which I engage to return in case the appointment agreed upon does not take place.—G. H. Gibbons. [Nate.—The name "Dr. Back" originally stood "Col.

Examination continued.-The alteration was made by Gibbons himself. On the 14th April witness met Mr. Gibbons and Mr. Tyndale; that was the first day witness thinks he saw Mr. Tyndale; it was soon after the deposit of the half of the £500. The afternoon of the same day witness saw Mr. Gibbons, who shewed him an acknowledgment from Mr. Tyndale that he had received the half of the note. Mr. Tyndale was not present. Mr. Gibbons introduced witness to Tyndale; he said nothing could be done on that day, as there were no directors at the India House. This was said in Tyndale's presence by either Mr. Gibbons or Mr. Tyndale, or both, and they said "we must wait till Monday." Witness met them on the Monday, and then it was said it was the Easter holidays, and nothing could be done till Wednesday. Witness met both of them frequently. Various excuses were made for the delay; one was, they said that the fact was the uncertain state of the ministry, as the appointment it was supposed would come from the president of the Board of Control. Witness paid a further sum to Mr. Gibbons some time atterwards. (Witness here identified a receipt for the half of a £300 note.) Witness saw Mr. Gibbons again on that day, and gave him the half of a £300 note: it was cut in half. Mr. Tyndale was not present. [Witness then identified a letter in Mr. Gibbons' hand-writing, and stated that it was in consequence of that the money was paid.]

The same was handed in and read as follows:

"Dated four o'clock, 24th April 1927, addressed to Col. Edwards.

"Mr. Gibbons' compliments to Col. Edwards, and acquaints him the appointment can take place to-morrow, but the party stipulated for a further lodgment of the half £300 prior to proceeding, this being the customary mode; and as the business will now be brought to a close, he can see no objection; he therefore requests a meeting to morrow morning, at Lloyd's, at a quarter before eleven o'clock."

Receipt read as follows:

"Memorandum, 25th April 1827.—I have this day received from Dr. Back the half of a £300 Bank of England note, which I regage to return case the object for which It is lodged is not accomplished this day.

G. H. GIBBONS.

Examination continued. - On that day the 25th April, when the half of the £300

note had been deposited, and a receipt taken, Gibbons introduced witness to the defendant Capt. Despard, at Lloyd's Coffee-house, who then lamented he had not been consulted sooner in the business, if he had, witness should not have been detained so long in town. would soon, he said, settle it; he left witness then at Lloyd's Coffee-house. with Gibbons, and went away, and they promised to return in about a quarter of an hour; witness waited for him between four and five hours, but Gibbons did not come. Captain Despard returned, and asked witness if he had seen Mr. Gibbons since he left. An appointment was made for a further meeting next day, when Capt. Despard came in and asked witness if Mr. Gibbons had returned. and witness said, no; he expressed great astonishment. Next day witness met Captain Despaid, who told witness he should not be disappointed again, that he would introduce him to two as respectable merchants as any in London. He took witness to Great St. Helen's, and introduced him to Capt. Anstice and a Mr. Stubbs. Capt. Anstice said he had the half of a £500 note in his possession for some time, but that it was of no manner of use until the half of a £300 was also deposited. Witness did not give it to him, not having it with him. Captain Despard said, that Captain Anstice had got most of Mr. Astell's appointments-it was supposed to be one of Mr. Astell's appointments: that he believed that it would come from Mr Astell. This was not said in Capt. Anstice's presence. Witness attended again the next day, the 27th, at Capt. Anstice's office, and other places; they (Capt. Despard and witness) were running about from one place to another. Capt. Despard, called upon witness that day at the Monument Coffee-house, and said every thing would be completed the Witness was waiting at next day. Captain Anstice's office in very great auxiety, and expressed his doubt to Anstice or Despard, of the ability of the parties to procure the appointment. Captain Anstice said he would be bound to forfeit £100 if it was not completed the next morning; and if witness would leave his son with him, if he wanted to go out of town, he (Anstice) would take care of him. He said "the young gentleman;" he did not call him witness's son. Witness never disclosed, up to the time the papers were ultimately stopped, that witness was the principal, and his name Dr. Back; he kept the name of Col. Edwards to the last. Capt. Anstice said the appointment would be forward ed to the house of the director who was to give it, who was in Hertfordshire, and that the director had declined signing it until the half of a £300 note was in Capt. Anstice's possession. He said he had forwarded the appointment by post to this director, who was in Hertfordshire, and he expected it to be returned by post, or perhaps he might come up to town and bring it with him himself; he said that the gentleman who was to give the appointment had been tired of waiting, (that was for the £300,) and he had expressed himself in very angry terms at the delay, and said he would wait no longer-that Capt. Anstice said. It must have been Capt. Anstice himself, it passed at his office. He said he had, two or three days since, returned the half of the £500 to Mr. Tyndale, from whom he had it, saying, it was of no use unless the half of the £300 accompanied The name of no other director was mentioned at all, as witness recollects, on Saturday the 28th. On that day witness was waiting all day at Capt. Anstice's office, in expectation of seeing Mr. Andiews, who had promised to be there. Witness cannot recollect who first said that Mr. Andrews was to be there; witness does not think he saw Capt. Despard there that day, but he saw Capt. Anstice, who went with witness to find out Mr. Andrews; they went to the office of Mr. Andrews, in Waterloo Place,-he was not there; they waited a long time, and they did not see him. Capt. Anstice said witness had great reason to complain that he was ill used. On the next day, Sunday, the 29th, witness saw him at his own house in Brook-street, Grosvenor-square. Witness saw Mr. Gibbons in the course of that day at Capt. Anstice's house in St. John's Wood Road, and Mr. Gibbons was talking to Capt. Anstice at the door of his private house. Capt. Anstice said that Mr. Gibbons wanted to go with witness and Anstice to Mr. Andrews, and he would not allow it. They went and he would not allow it. to Mr. Andrews (without Gibbons) to Brook-street, and there saw Mr. Andrews, who said the appointment was certain, and that the gentleman who was to give it would be in town the next day; he said he would bring the appointment with him to Great St. Helen's (Anstice's office) by two o'clock the following day; he said he was sorry that witness and he had missed one another the day before, that they had not met; that he wished to settle the business as much as witness did, that the money would be very useful to his client at that particular time. He said witness must be very secret, and let nothing of the business transpire to any one. Witness went there according to appointment, on Monday the 30th, to St. Helen's Place; he waited till four o'clock before Mr. Andrews came.

said that Mr. Gibbons, who was to give the appointment, would be with him that evening, and if Capt. Anstice would call upon him in the afternoon in his way home to St. John's Wood Road, the hour of meeting to morrow, that was the following day, should be fixed on. [Here witness proved the receipt of a note from Mr. Gibbons the 30th April. The same was handed in and read, as follows, signed G. H. Gibbons:]

bons:] "Monument Coffee-house,
"Sir: I am quite in the dark as to what is going on. I went to Mr. betties at three o'clock, being sold you were not be three at that time, but another by the control of the control of the control another by the control of the control another by the control of the control
another by the co

Examination continued. On the 1st of May witness went to Capt. Anstice's office, and saw Mr. Andrews there; a note had arrived at Capt Anstice's office from Mr. Andrews, which was opened in witness's presence by Mr. Stubbs, Capt. Anstice happening to be out. [The witness here identified a letter which had been brought to him by a messenger, which letter was proved by Mr. Robert Thornhill to be in Capt. Anstice's handwriting]. The same was read, as follows, signed J. P. Anstice, Tuesday evening, 8, Waterloo-place, addressed to Col. Edwards

"Sir: My friend sends a messenger in with this to-night, purposely to let you know that Mr.Back must be at this place by ten o'clock to-morrow moning; have the goodness to let hun come by hunself, if you please, as no third party will be seen by the gentleman, who will take him immediately, and get all done. I must take the liberty of calling your attention to the necessity of this being observed; and I will further add, that if any delay or disappointment takes place now, it will be entirely owing to a want of confidence, and that on our parts you will find all to be correct."

Examination of Dr. Back continued. No. 8, Waterloo Place is Mr. Andrews's office; on the following day, the 2d of May, witness was at the Monument coffee-house, and there met Mr. Andrews; witness's son went down to his office as he was desired, in consequence of that letter; at the Monument coffee-house witness afterwards saw Mr. Andrews and Mr. Sutton; they said that every thing was then completed, and we must go to the India-House, and that witness must pay over the other two halves of the notes; that he refused to do until the young man had actually passed; they continued to press for the other halves of the notes; in walking to the India-House witness and the defendants went into another coffee-house opposite the India-House, called the Ship; witness returned to the Ship, and said he would give them the other two halves of the notes, and laid them upon the table; witness had gone away for a little time to consider whether he would give them the other halves; they went into the Ship without him, and appointed to meet him there: then a new difficulty was started, as the corresponding halves of those two notes were not forthcoming; either Mr. Sutton or Mr. Andrews stated that, witness is not certain which; and Mr. Gibbons had told witness some days before that those halves of the notes were in the possession of Capt. Anstice,-the two first halves. Then a sort of dispute arose upon the subject between Sutton and Andrews, and witness was desired to walk to the other end of the coffee-room, which he did, until they had settled it; but before he did that, he had taken up the half of the five hundred pound note, leaving the second half of the three hundred pound; witness declared positively he would not give up the half of the five hundred pound till the young man had been sworn in. Witness's son was waiting under the India-House, walking about. The other half of the note was taken up by one of the other gentlemen, he thinks Capt. Anstice. The papers were then put into witness's hands by either Mr. Andrews or Capt. Anstice; witness then went with his son to the cadet office in the India-House; witness saw Mr. Gibbons there. Messrs. Andrews and Sutton were left at the Ship; Mr. Gibbons was either in the cadet office or at the door, but he went into the office with witness, and staid a long while there. Witness gave the appointment to a clerk in the cadet office, who immediately disappeared with it; he went out of the room, and witness waited till six o'clock, and he never returned; while the clerk was gone, Mr. Gibbons attached himself very closely to witness all the time, and at last witness said to him, "I shall not wait any longer then, and I should conceive you need not either." Gibbons asked where he could see witness next morning? Witness asked him what he wanted? he said he wanted to receive the difference, as he had got this appointment for eight hundred pounds instead of nine hundred guineas; he wanted to receive the difference between the eight hundred pounds and nine hundred guineas, being a hundred and forty-five pounds, of which he was to receive forty-five pounds, and pay Mr. Wright one hundred pounds, that was all he was to have for his troublehis words were, "that is all I get by it." Witness in the course of the morning left the India-House two or three times, and went into the Ship; at those times he found Sutton or Mr. Andrews there, sometimes both, and sometimes one was out; when witness went he was detained so long at the cadet office, they began to be apprehensive there was something wrong; they said they could not tell what to make of it; there was something wrong in the business, and there was something irregular they were afraid. Be. fore parting, Sutton walked with witness into the street behind the India-House. or on the side of the India-House; and he said he hoped there was no irregularity, but if the matter was found out he should be a ruined man, and lose his friend for ever. Witness appointed to meet Sutton the next day to tell him what turn things had taken, but did not go, being sent for to the India-House by the directors; witness afterwards saw Mr. Sutton at Little Hampton; he came to witness; nothing particular passed; he begged particularly to know what witness said when before the directors? Witness told him he had not been before the directors; he asked what witness meant to do? witness said he had nothing to say to him upon the subject, and declined all conversation; witness is not acquainted with Mr. Prescott, never saw him to his knowledge. Witness's son's age in March last year was between twenty-two and twenty-three, he was born in October 1805.

Cross-examined by Mr. Starkie .- Witness is a doctor in divinity; has not on other occasions than this gone in the name of Edwards. When he went to negociate for the office as Colonel, his dress was He might have a black silk black. handkerchief; he had been abroad a good many years, and had been in the habit of wearing a black silk handkerchief. Was not in the habit of wearing a military dress; has worn an undress military coat and yellow waistcoat on the Continent. When he passed as Col. Edwards he never wore an undress military coat. He has worn a blue camlet clock, but does not believe either of the defendants ever saw him in it, merely to keep out the rain. In all respects, except a black handkerchief, he dressed in black as a clergyman. When witness passed as Col. Edwards he had some of his cards. Col. Edwards was the husband of his present wife, whom witness married in 1819. Witness took the cards for the purpose. He does not know that he has them now; witness found them in an old box or drawer, or some such thing. Witness has never gone by the name of Col. Drake; never went by any other name than his own on the Continent. Was ordained before he went to the Continent some years. Was chaplain to a foreign garrison. Resided at Brussels; part of the time at Valenciennes in France, but principally at Brussels; he lived also at Ostend. Was tutor to a son of the Duke of Richmond at Brussels, Lord Frederick Lennox; in the year 1817, witness thinks.

Was tutor to him very nearly twelve months, till he went abroad with his father to Canada. This negociation first of all began in August 1826, and witness renewed it in February 1827, when he communicated with the East-India Company. Witness wrote to Sir Geo. Robinson, the then chairman. All the communications witness had with the East-India Company upon this subject were by letter. Witness did not see the solicitor before he had written to Sir George Robinson; afterwards he had repeated interviews with him. These papers were written severally upon the days they bear date; they are not transcripts. (shewing a paper) contains some of the same dates more particularly.

Col. Sweny Toone, examined by Mr. Gurney .- Witness has been for thirty years a director of the East-India Company; the defendant Mr. Prescott has been for some years past a director. ness served with him seven years in the direction, which made them acquainted. The directors of the Company in their turn fill up the several appointments that are in their gift, and sometimes lend them to each other. It constantly occurs that the director in whose turn the appointment is, lends it to another director, to receive it back again. In the latter end of April in the last year, Mr. Prescott applied to witness for an appointment in witness's gift; witness thinks it was the 26th or 27th April. That (identifying it) s the note witness received from Mr. Prescott. It was in an envelope. [The same was read as follows dated April 26th, 1827, addressed to Col. Toone.]

" My Dear Sir: Will you have the goodness to lend me a Madras or Bengal cavalry appointments and I will repay you immediately I get one?

"lain, your's, &c. C. ELTON PRESCOTT."

Examination continued — That meant a cavalry cadetship. Witness cannot recollect whether his answer was in writing or verbal; he thinks verbal; that they met in the street, and witness told hum he had one, and should be very happy to accommodate him, having great respect for him. Witness dated say he was in the committee of correspondence at the India-House on Thursday the 26th or Friday the 27th. Something then occurred as to a nomination that had before been given to a person; does not recollect if the name was Frederick. In consequence of what did occur, witness spoke to Mr. Prescott respecting this promise, but certainly not on that day, it must have been on the following morning, or the day after that. Witness cannot exactly recollect what it was he said to him, but witness said there was something that happened in the committee that made witness very anxious about this cadetship he had promised him. Witness particularly said, " you know this young gentleman perfectly well?" and he said, "yes, he is one of the finest youths in England;" that witness perfectly recollected. Witness added, "and you know his family?" - Mr. Prescott said " yes, I know his father; he is a respectable clergyman in Devonshire." He told witness it was necessary to quicken the matter; that the young gentleman was within two months of being ofage, and at the termination of those two months he could not be appointed. In fact, after the age of twenty-two they cannot be appointed. Witness has not; the least recollection of any thing more being said.

Upon being asked whether any thing. was said about what was passing in his mind, witness said: " Upon my expressing those kind of doubts, he said it was caused, he supposed, by a young gentleman that had passed at the India-House about three or four years before; as that has nothing to do with the question, you will permit me to say it has nothing to do with the question; and it was in consequence of that he said he knew this young, gentleman very well, and his father was a clergyman in Devonshire." Witness after this conversation wrote a note to Mr. The wit-Abington, of the cadet-office. ness here identified the note. The same was read, dated the 28th April, signed by was read, dated the ZSH April, Sighted by S. Toone, addressed to Mr. Abington, "William Abington, Esquire, "Be so good to pass Captain Prescott's youth without delay, as he is near twenty-two, and I will sign the papers on Wednesday morning next, but let the youth pass as soon as possible. "If the same papers are sent to me this day, I will sign then."

will sign them.

On that day (Saturday), when witness was at home in Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square, he received a packet, purporting to come from Mr. Abington, the head of the cadet-office, enclosing two papers marked A and B (identified by witness). Witness signed the latter paper marked A. [Upon looking at the originals, witness said both were signed with his signature. | Having signed them, he enclosed them to Mr. Abington, and witness put his seal upon them, and directed them to Mr. Abington, at the India-House, the same day. One of the India-House messengers who came with it, waited whilst witness sealed them up, and directed them to Mr. Abington. ter witness had sent them off, something occurred to witness's mind which induced him to send a note to Mr. Abington. Witness had been called from dinner, and signed the paper suddenly; some-thing did occur to his mind afterwards. This was the note (identifying it) sent to Mr. Abington. That note witness sent by the Twopenny-Post, and another by his servant to Mr. Prescott, the same evening. Mr. Mr. Gurney. I call for that note.

Mr. Brougham (counsel for Mr. Prescott). We have not got it, or you should have it; we never had it.

Joseph Williams examined by Mr. Gurney.—Witness is servant to Co-Toone. He perfectly well relonel membered, about April last year, being sent with a letter by Colonel Toone to Captain Prescott's. Witness took it to Captain Prescott's house, and gave it to a female servant. Witness never took any other letter from Colonel Toone to Captain Prescott.

About this letter I Mr. Brougham. know nothing, except that Mr. Prescott says he never saw it.

Colonel Toone called again, and cross-examined by Mr. Brougham .-Q. You say that you gave him a verbal answer; did you not also, having received that application in writing, write a letter?

Lord Tenterden. What has this to do with it?

Mr. Brougham. Does not your Lordship see that there was only one letter, and that may be the letter? He says he wrote one.

Lord Tenterden. The witness left it rather doubtfully as to the first communi-

Mr. Brougham. We have the letter.

Lord Tenterden. How did the letter  $x_0$ ?—A. I answered the letter.—Q. How did you send it to him? -A. I think it very likely by one of the India-House messengers. -Q. You are not sure you did not send it by your servant? -A. I do not recollect sending more than one by my servant. -Q. Are you sure you did not send more than one?-A. I think it must have been by an India-House messenger; we were upon very friendly terms.

Mr. Gurney (to Williams). What day did you take the letter?—A. On Saturday the 28th of April.—Q. What time of the day?—A. In the afternoon part.— Q. Was that after dinner?-A. Yes; my master wrote the letter before he dined, and I went afterwards, and it was in broad daylight.

Examination of Colonel Toone resumed.-Witness recollected saying in his note to Mr. Prescott, that he had received the papers from Mr. Abington, and that witness had signed the papers; but it occurred to him that he had not seen the young man, contrary to his practice; and that witness had written to Mr. Abington (for he concluded the papers had gone to Mr. Abington), to state that witness had signed the papers sent to him; but that it was his positive orders that the cadet should not be presented to pass till witness saw him; that was witness's positive orders, and he sent his servant with them again the next morning too.

The letter to Mr. Abington was here put in; the same was read, dated Mortimer-street, Saturday evening, 28th of April, signed S. Toone, and addressed to Mr. Abington ]

"Dear Sir,
"I signed the papers you sent me this evening, but before the matter is finally concluded, I request you will contrive to let me see the youth, and with that view I will call at the India-House on Monday next, and I will attend there before twelve o'clock, and direct the youth to attend at twelve on Monday next."

Examination continued .- On Monday morning witness sent another letter to Mr. Abington; having sent the first by the Twopenny-post, he was afraid it might miscarry, as they sometimes do. The second letter he sent by his servant,

The same was handed in and read, dated Monday morning, the 30th of April, 1827, from Colonel Toone to Mr. Abing-

"Dear Sir,
"The young gentleman nominated to my Madras cas alry nomination, for which I returned the papers yesterday, is not to be presented to be passed until Mr. Toone has seen him, and with "Toone will attend at Mr. Abington's that view Mr. Toone will attend at Mr. Abington's office as soon as possible "

Examination continued. — On that Monday morning witness went to Mr. Abington's office at the East-India House at the time appointed. Witness never saw the cadet, and never has seen him. Witness remained at the office two hours, and he did not arrive. Witness never received any acknowledgment from Mr. Prescott of the letter he sent him on Saturday evening. Witness does not think he had any other conversation with Mr. Prescott respecting the cadetship than that mentioned. He had the fullest confidence in Mr. Prescott, and did not enter fully into it. He had the greatest regard for him. Nothing more came to witness's knowledge upon the subject until the matter came before the directors on Wednesday the 2d of May, unless what has been now stated may be considered as part of it; the precautions witness took to prevent the thing passing. When witness attended two hours, and found the young man did not come, he gave positive directions that he should not be passed on any account whatever, as he had not been presented; that he should not pass till witness had seen him. Witness knew nothing of any orders that the chairman or the deputy-chairman had given; he was quite ignorant of it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Brougham. When Captain Prescott made the application, witness believes he said there was no man in England, Scotland, or Ireland, he would more readily oblige than Captain Prescott; that was what he felt at the time. The first letter witness sent to Mr. Abington .was by the twopenny-post, late on Saturday evening. The two pennypost letters had constantly miscarried, and witness sent his own servant with the second, on Monday morning, that he might he there by nine o'clock. When witness wrote the letter to go on Saturday, he gave it to his servant to put into the twopenny-post that evening before six o'clock. Witness believes the presentment of the appointment never was made to the Committee. Witness never heard that it was : and has no reason to believe that it was. It may either be presented to the directors at their usual meeting on the Wednesday, or to the Committee that meet daily any day but Saturday. There was a very considerable inquiry among the directors respecting the whole of this matter. There are dinners held of the directors, from time to time; but not on Monday or courtdays. Witness had been indisposed, and did not believe he had attended any dinners for two or three months. Witness was present at a Court of Directors that was held after that inquiry. The Committee that had made inquiry had made a report to the directors before that meeting. (A question arising out of this was objected to, and not pressed.) Something had occurred with respect to a gentleman of the name of Frederick. It had nothing to do with any sale or traffic of any appointment. Witness does not know if Mr. Frederick is first cousin to Capt. Prescott.

Mr. Edward Drake Back examined by Mr. Carter .- Witness is the son of Dr. Back; recollects being with his father in town the latter end of April and the beginning of May 1827; recollects going the morning of the 22d of May to No. 8, Waterloo-place, Mr. Andrews'; believes he saw Mr. Andrews there, and Mr. Sutton, and some persons besides. (Papers A. and B. shewn to witness.) Saw those papers there; they were produced by a gentleman not known to witness; beheves it was Mr. Sutton, the gentleman sitting on the floor. Upon the papers being produced, those persons directed witness to fill up what was necessary. There were marks in pencil in places where witness was to write. Question four was one. Witness filled up the answer to question four. The words "Charles Elton Prescott" were written in pencil for witness to write in ink. Witness wrote the words "Charles Elton Prescott." Witness had never before that time heard the name of Capt. Prescott, and did not know him; he also signed his name to the second paper, after the end of question eight. In paper B. "Edward Drake Back," is witness's signature, signed at the same time and place. Having signed the papers, witness left them with the two persons that were there. They then merely said witness was to go to the Monument Coffee-houseand they would be there almost as soon as he was. Witness did return to the Mo-Coffee-house, and afterwards waited about the India House for his father; he afterwards went into the Cadet Office, with his father. Some person desired witness to go in, and witness said he was to go in to be introduced to Captain Prescott. Witness went in.

Witness saw Capt. Prescott for so very little time, he cannot say whether he is here; he did not see him long enough to have any recollection of his face again. One of the waiters introduced witness at the time he went in, or named the person he was to see. When he introduced witness he said, "Mr. Back;" that was the person desirous of witness's going in to see Capt. Prescott. person witness saw when he went in, asked him his age, which witness told him; and he then asked if witness liked to go where he was going, and if he had ever been in the army. This was all that he asked witness. Had never, to his knowledge, seen that person before.

Cross-examined by Mr. Polloch (Counsel for Mr. Prescott) .- Witness knows very little about the arrangement his father has spoken of to-day; he knew that the business was going on for the purpose of detecting those people, and that was all he knew. Witness knew that, as far as he was concerned, this was not real: and in answer to the question, "Do you believe that any person has received or is to receive any pecuniary consideration, or any thing convertible in any mode into a pecuniary benefit, on account of your nomination?" he put "certainly not." The words " Certainly not," witness wrote at Little Hampton. Witness believes it was on Wednesday he was at the East-India House; he took no notes of any thing; he understood he had been sent for in order that he might be seen.

Re-examined by Mr. Carter.—Witness went to the India House with his father the same day he went to Waterloo place and signed the papers.

Mr. Frederick Haldane examined by Mr. Solicitor General.— Witness is a clerk in the Cadet Office, India House; recollects Mr. Prescott applying to him in the month of April 1827. Cannot exactly recollect the day, it was between Thursdayand Saturday; he sent for witness from the office to receive instructions from him, and put into witness's hand a letter. Witness went to his room. Mr. Prescott merely asked him if he understood the letter. Witness gave the letter to Colonel Toone.

Lord Tenterden.—Colonel Toone did not speak of the loss of any letter.

Mr. Solicitor General.—He was asked whether he had written a letter to the same effect as the conversation be had had; he said he was not quite certain.

Lord Tenterden - A letter by the two-

Mr. Gurney.—No: in answer to the first application that was made; that part about England, Scotland, and Ireland.

The witness continued. — In consequence of that, witness took the letter to the cadet office, and deposited it in the case where it is usual to deposit such letters. Mr. Prescott did not tell witness at all precisely what he was to do, but merely to write it off, that is, to mark off the appointment in the cadet book.

Lord Tenterden.—I do not know what that means; I suppose it means that Col. Toone's appointment was filled up.

Mr. Gurney.-It is marking the exchange.

The witness continued .- Witness did [Mr. Abington produced a book, which was handed to the witness.] When wrote off it shewed that the nomination was put to the director to whom it was transferred; it purported that this was a transfer from Col. Toone to Mr. Prescott. On the following Monday witness saw Col. Toone at his (witness's) office. He said he lamented the circumstance of having lent Mr. Prescott the nomination, but directed that the gentleman was not to pass until he saw him. Witness remembers the papers being brought into his office on the 2d May. He took them immediately from the office, and gave them into the hands of the deputy secretary, Mr. Auber, having received directions from Mr. Auber to that effect. [Some papers were handed to the witness. | These are the papers, and this (the recommendatory letter) is signed by Mr. Prescott.

Mr. Edward Sharpe examined by Mr. Serieant Bosanquet - Witness is a clerk in the cadet office at the India House. Witness, in consequence of a message, did attend Mr. Prescott the director on the 28th of April in his room. He produced a note from Col. Toone, intimating a compliance with his wish to give an appointment, and for the papers to be sent up to Col Toone for his signature. He also produced the paper A, and asked witness if the paper was complete. Witness said they were not complete; that the first part was not completed, the letter of recommendation was not complete; it was not filled up. The fourth question was not answered; the other parts were filled up. Capt. Prescott asked witness in what way the first letter should be filled in (the letter of recommendation); witness answered, that if Col. Toone signed the nomination, Capt. Prescott ought to sign the first letter, of recommendation. Capt. Prescott said, "is not that irregular?" Witness answered that it was, but that since Col. Toone was to sign the nomination, it was necessary for Mr. Prescott to sign it, as witness presumed Col. Toone knew nothing of the other parties. Witness also filled in the fourth question by the desire of Capt. Prescott as a cadet, for a guide, in pencil. Capt. Prescott then signed the letter. Prescott asked witness to fill it in in a proper way. Witness recommended Capt. Prescott to allow him to write a note to Col. Toone, saying in what way the papers ought to be signed. Capt. Prescott desired witness to fill up the nomination, and to send it to Col. Toone for his signature. He said, in consequence of the note he had received from Col. Toone, he would not give him any further trouble. but desired witness to fill up the nomination, and send it to Col. Toone for signature. If Capt. Prescott had signed the nomination himself, and the recommendation had been signed by the person to whom it was given, that would not have given Col. Toone any additional trouble: it was only transferring it to Capt. Prescott. Col. Toone would have had nothing to do with the papers in that case. Witness was not desired to write to Col, Toone. If the papers had been in a different form, they would have been in a form that Capt. Prescott would have had to sign them; that would have given Col. Toone no trouble. After witness had filled up the nomination, Capt. Prescott desired him to write a note, transmitting them to Col. Toone. Witness accordingly wrote a note in Capt. Prescott's name to Col. Toone, and took it to Capt. Prescott for his approval. Capt. Prescott desired him not to write it in his name, but to write it in Mr. Abington's name. Mr. Abington was absent from illness: he was there the Monday following. Witness accordingly prepared a note in Mr. Abington's name, and enclosed those two papers for Col-Witness delivered Toone's signature. the packet to the commodore of the messengers, named John Salter. There are two of them. Capt. Prescott desired witness to give it to the commodore to take it to Col. Toone's house, and the messenger was to wait at Col. Toone's for his answer, and then to take it on to Capt. Prescott's residence. thing where Capt. Prescott's name was mentioned in the note was, that by the desire of Capt. Prescott they were transmitted to him, but in the name of Mr. Abington. There was no intimation where they were to go afterwards.

Q. Just look at those two other papers which bear date I believe February 1827, and see if Capt. Prescott's writing is to either of those papers. [Two papers were handed to the witness.]

Mr. Brougham .- It is his writing, no doubt.

Lord Tenterden .- My note must state it is proved.

Mr. Brougham.—We admit it. Lord Tenterden.—He has proved the recommendation was signed by Capt. Prescott.

Mr. Serieant Bosanquet.-The solicitor-general opened, there was a preceding appointment, upon the recommendation of Sutton, given by Capt. Prescott in the February following, which might afford a reason why Sutton's name was kept out of view.

Lord Tenterden (to the witness) .-Have those papers got Capt. Prescott's signature?-A. I have every reason to believe it is Capt. Prescott's signature.

Lord Tenterden .- Have you seen him

write ?-A. Yes.

Mr. Brougham .- We admit the anpointment was made the February following.

Lord Tenterden. — But unless something is read or said, I do not know it.

Mr. Brougham.—We wish to save the papers being read; we admit the appointment was made in the February preceding upon Capt. Prescott's nomination.

Lord Tenterden .- I was quite sure you would not admit it in the way they wish it-read the papers.

Mr. Serjeant Bosanquet .- Is that an exchanged appointment?-A. Yes. Q. And Capt. Prescott signs it?-A.

Yes, the nomination. Q. And the recommendation is signed by whom ?-A. Sutton. Lord Tenterden. - What is the date of it?-A. The 16th February 1827.

Cross-examined by Mr. Brougham. The February appointment is filled up in Mr. Abington's hand. Witness is next to Mr. Haldane, under Mr. Abington, in office. Q. When Capt. Prescott said he did not like to give Col. Toone any further trouble in the matter, was not that in answer to an observation of yours, that you had better write to Col. Toone to know in what way the appointment should be made out, in order to save him the trouble of writing the letter?-A. Yes.

Re-examined by Mr. Serjeant Bosanquet.-Witness proposed to write to Col. Toone, informing him that Capt. Prescott ought to sign the nomination, as it was an exchange or a loan.

Lord Tenterden .- What did you mean by saying just now that Capt. Prescott's observation was in answer to your proposal to write to Col. Toone, to know how it should be done? Did you write to know that, or did you write stating how it was done? A. May I have the queson put again?

Lord Tenterden .- It has been put three Asiatic Journal. Vol. 25. No. 148.

times. A. I proposed to Mr. Prescott to write to Mr. Toone, to say that if Capt. Prescott was to sign the nomination, the proper exchange would be made upon the face of it.

Lord Tenterden,-It is better to strike it out; here are three different answers.

John Salter examined by Mr. Gurney. -Witness is one of the commodores of the messengers at the India-House; he keeps a book in which he enters letters he receives to take to any person. Turns to Saturday the 28th of April in the last year: he did receive from Mr. Abington's office a letter to send to Col. Toone, and delivered it to John Sullivan, with directions to take it to Col. Toone, in Mortimer Street; to wait an answer, and to take it on to Capt. Prescott.

John Sullivan examined by Mr. Gurney .- Witness received on Saturday the 28th of April, a packet to take to Col. Toone; witness waited for an answer at Col. Toone's, and took the packet he received to Capt. Prescott's house, and left it there; it was a scaled packet, addressed to William Abington, esq.

William Abington, esq. examined by Mr. Gurney .- Witness is the chief clerk in the cadet office. On Saturday the 28th of April witness was absent from indisposition; he was at the office on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, after that; on the Tuesday he believes he saw Capt. Prescott. He came into the office, and said he understood he had signed a wrong paper; witness's reply was, "I am aware of that-you had no occasion to sign the recommendatory letter"-Col. Toone had nothing to do with it, having transferred it to him. He desired witness to stop the papers as soon as they came to the office, and not to pass the young man, or suffer him to be passed, until Col. Toone had seen him. On the following day, the Wednesday, witness saw Capt. Prescott again-he asked it the young man had attended at the office to be passed; witness's answer was, "no-he had not. His reply was, " mind you let me have the papers-stop the papers as soon as they arrive-do not suffer the young man to be passed till Col. Toone has seen him." A message was sent into witness's office, while Capt. Prescott was in the committee, to know if the papers had arrived; that inquiry witness understood was from Capt. Prescott.

The Right Hon. Charles Watkin Williams Wynn examined by Mr. Solicitor-General. - Witness was President of the Board of Control in the month of April 1827; witness knows nothing of the parties, or the subject in discussion today; he was never in the company of Capt. Prescott or the other directors-he had no acquaintance with them.

William Astell, esq. M.P., examined 4 B

by Mr. Solicitor-General.—Witness is one of the directors of the East-India Company; is unacquainted with any of the parties to this indictment except Capt. Prescott; witness never heard the name, and never saw the name, of any one of them; knows nothing more of the subject than he had heard here and in the Court of Directors, of which witness was a member.

Cross-examined by Mr. Brougham.— Witness has known Capt. Prescott for twenty years or more; after having been in the Company's sea-service, he (CaptPrescott) has been a director eight years.
Q. What is the character and reputation of your colleague, Capt. Prescott? A.
I can only speak from my own opinion.
Q. I ask you, according to your knowledge, what character he has borne?

Lord Tenterden.—In what way is he spoken of? A. I have always considered him a respectable man. Q. Have you not sense enough to distinguish between your opinion and the reputation of the person? A. Certainly. Q. Then attend to the question.

Mr. Brougham .- I want to know the character and reputation the gentleman has borne. - A. As far as I have any knowledge, he has always been spoken of as a very respectable and honourable man. Witness was not chairman or deputychairman at the time the prosecution was ordered. Mr. Pattison was deputy-chairman, and is now; he was elected last April as deputy-chairman. The directors being on friendly terms with each other, confiding in each other's power and wish to repay, borrow patronage and appointments from each other. Witness does not know that Mr. Pattison in November last borrowed an appointment from Captain Prescott, or applied to him.

Mr. Gurney.—We will now read the paper A, the recommendatory letter.

The same was read as follows:

"Gentlemen,—I do hereby declare upon my honor, that I received a nomination for the Madras Cavalry from Swony Toone, Esq. gratutonsly, and that I have given it gratuitously to Mr. Edward Drake Back, with whose family and connexions I am well acquainted. I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant, C. ELTON PRESCOTT."

C. ELTON PRESCOTT."

Addressed to "the Honorable Court of Directors of the United East-India Company."

Mr. Gurney.—Now question fourth, The same was read as follows:

"Who recommended you to Sweny Toone, Esq., the nominating director, for this appointment?" Answer. "Charles Eton Prescott, Esq."

Lord Tenterden.—Is that your case? Mr. Solicitor-General.—Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Brougham.—May it please your Lordship, gentlemen of the Jury: Really, gentlemen, I am sure in addressing you on behalf of this most respectable gentleman, Captain Prescott, for whom alone I am counsel here to-day, it would be a most absurd, not to say ridiculous, at all events an unseemly, affectation in me, to pretend that I feel any of that anxiety and depression, or even those feelings of weight so as to be oppressed by them, which are very often the lot of counsel when they are addressing a jury on behalf of a defendant well stricken in years, and of a most eminent station in society, arrived. after a long course of exertion and of peril. to the very height of his profession, and of his ambition too; who has borne an uniformly fair and spotless reputation in the discharge of many duties, where much was left to his own discretion during the earlier part of his life, and of duties still more delicate, and besetting his path with still more hazard and temptations, during the last eight years of his life; I mean while he had the disposal of his ample share of the magnificent patronage which these twenty-four tellow-subjects of ours, the directors of the East-India Company, enjoy. A person in circumstances for the first time suspected, or affected to be suspected, and put upon his trial for the purpose of clearing his character never before questioned, ordinarily lays his counsel under the pressure of very considerable anxiety for the event of such a case confided to his hands. But I say here, today, I cannot affect, for a moment, to feel for the purpose as it were of adorning the exordium of the very short address that I am called upon to make to you,-I cannot affect to feel the least concern for this gentleman's character or for his fate; that character and that fate are committed almost nominally, and for form's sake, to my defence at this moment, but committed to your care substantially, if indeed there is any evidence brought to impeach it. I ought rather to say the evidence which I have to thank the East-India Company, the prosecutors of the indictment, for an opportunity of having heard, and for the power of meeting, as I have; also on the part of Captain Brescott, heartily to return my thanks for the power and opporportunity of meeting this charge in a public court of justice.

Gentlemen, I quite agree with the Solicitor General, that the directors of this great trading Company, opulent, and still more powerful than wealthy, whose dominious are large and revenues ample, but whose power and patronage are still more precious than those of wealth or dominion,-I quite agree with my honand learned friend, that a Company entrusted with that power, and above all entrusted with that, so dangerous to human virtue, that immense patronage, though individuals and not ministers of state, that they could do no otherwise than they have done: first inquire, and by their inquiry sift the case; and then, whatever was the result of that investication, because it was a private inquisition, bring that case before a jury of their country, that it might a second time undergo a more satisfactory, because a more public scrutiny and trial, before an English judge and an English jury; that they would to the end of time have laboured under a suspicion; that they would for ever thenceforward have been taunted to have made a compromise; that there would always have lurked among discontented, or malicious, or captious folk, a notion behind that there had been something concealed which would not bear the light. Though the individuals had pleaded guilty who were the real criminals in this instance, and though of that there could be no doubt, yet if they had let off without a trial, whatever might be their opinion, however satisfactory the private investigation had proved to them before: whatever had been their opinion on the result of it, some suspicion would have lurked, and seemed to linger about their conduct, if, because the other defendant, Capt. Prescott, who stood upon his defence, was one of their own colleagues, they had not brought his part of the charge to a full, strict and satisfactory, because public scrutiny. I agree with my learned friend the Solicitor General in this observation; and therefore, it is instead of complaining, I, on the contrary, rejoice on the part of the defendant that the matter was allowed to take this course. It is the only satisfactory course for me. On the other hand, I agree that the East-India Company, for their own sakes as well as for their hon. colleague, Capt. Prescott, could take no other course, because this is a public acquittal, and the former was only a private acquittal.

Now, gentlemen, what is the evidence brought before you, upon which you are to judge of the gentleman's conduct. That a cadetcy was applied for in consequence of an advertisement; that a clergyman who sometimes passed by the name of Col. Edwards, but sometimes by that of the Rev. Dr. Back-that Dr. Back applied in consequence of that advertisement in the name of M. N., and treated, and then broke off the negociation, in a way not to me, I own, very intelligible, because he said he was astonished to find that M. N. meant to take a premium for the appointment. He says, "I thought he had only advertised from a mere benevolent motive of letting somebody have a good appointment for the bare cost of the outfit, and I was thunderstruck when I was told that M. N. was to receive money beyond the sum required for the outfit." That after that he thought better of it and renewed the negociation, and again flew off, and went to the East-India House, and under the protection of the governor and chairman, and deputy-chairman, very properly was employed to sift to the bottom the whole of this, which appeared suspicious at first, and turned out afterwards criminal. That he carried on the negociation in collusion-I speak it without offence—a necessary collusion with the Company; with the money of the Company. That the Company, in order to inquire more into it, supplied the funds with which the Colonel, the Doctor, was to bribe Mr. Sutton or Mr. Andrews, in order that the crime might be completed, though they did not stand by and see the parties traffic and deal, and commit the guilt of office-brokerage; but they assisted the party to accomplish that which the individual having the will had not the resources to accomplish himself. That this was done by the chairman, or deputy chairman, but with the purest and best object in view, whether with a very good judgment or a very accurate view of their duty in the course of the administration of the criminal justice of the country, or with a view to the proper disposal of their funds, to bribe one of their directors, as it was supposed, though it turned out to be unfounded. I do not quarrel with that; I do not cavil at the zeal they shewed that the parties should be punished: but this turns out only to involve the Doctor, and Mr. Andrews, and Mr. Sutton, and all those agents in this conspiracy. I ask you, is there a tittle of proof, is there a shadow of evidence, to implicate in the slightest degree the hon, and worthy centleman who sits before me, their colleague, Capt. Prescott? I ask of you upon their evidence, upon their own shewing-I call upon you to look at their case, and I say that the right hon. gentleman who sits by my Lord, who has denied, which he need not have done, upon his oath, and also my honourable friend Mr. Astell, for a long while a director, and for some time chairman of the Company, as honourable a man as any one I have the honour of knowing, who has also truly denied all knowledge of this transaction,-you may as well suppose that their character was concerned, and more so, because Mr. Wynn's name, the President of the Board of Control, was mentioned, and Mr. Astell's too. It was said that Mr. Anstice gets all Mr. Astell's patronage; though he is committing this offence, he cites Mr. Astell as the person whose patronage he enjoys. But who believes it? over whose mind has a shadow of suspicion passed as to the conduct of the President of the Board of Control. or of Mr. Astell the late chairman, and now a director of the Company? No more has been given against Capt. Prescott, in other respects, but less in this respect, as Capt. Prescott's name was never mentioned.

My learned friend the Solicitor Gene-ton was the friend of Capt. Prescott; that he had been engaged in electioneering contests for him in the India-House. That is not proved, but I will admit it to be so: a man has his friends in great canvasses, as we see, and which we see more and more of, and the great reason for the ample patronage which, being one of these sovereigns, if I may so call them. places in the twenty-four directors. Our ears are fatigued with the constant canvass, the never-ending solicitations that are going on without end, sometimes without numbers, in the election for the office of director, time after time, and a number of times canvassing the proprietors and holders of India stock, canvassing all their relations and friends; and that during those canvasses there are committees; that a committee will have its chairman, and that the chairman will be active; he is generally an active and useful friend of the candidate, and that Sutton, as was opened by my learned friend for the prosecution, being such a canvassing friend, I do not deny; it may be so, it is what all of them do; that being a friend, he rendered essential service to Capt. Prescott, and for that he was so grateful that he gave him in one year two cadetcies. That is where the case begins and ends; and my learned friend says, I know no great difference whether a man sells for the lucre of gain his patronage, or gives it to an electioneering agent in the discharge of an obligation to him; it comes to the same thing, with the suspicion, my learned friend says, that he meant to sell it. With great submission to him, it comes to a very different thing. A man might well do the one thing without having a lurking suspicion, which I deny that there is any evidence of in the case, but, on the contrary, there is evidence that he never had his mind crossed by the suspicion. My learned friend said he had a knowledge; no, he never said that; he knew his case would not bear him out in that, but he had the means of knowledge-he had guilty means of knowledge, or the means of guilty knowledge. I may have the means of knowing a thing, and if in a question of civil rights I have shut my eyes voluntarily, and have not taken pains to inform myself, the circumstance of my wilful ignorance arising from my shutting my eyes must come against my pocket, and I must pay damages. But it is new to me, and I think to his Lordship, who has had much more experience than I have in these matters, although mine is not of yesterday-I have had some experience upon subjects of this sort, but I never heard of a man being chargeable with a crime because he had the means of knowing, not that he knew it or sus-ral opened the case to you, that Mr. Sut-

pected it, not that he was aware and wilfully lent himself to a criminal act being done, but he had the means, if he chose to use them. He might have sent Mr. Lawford or any other attorney to sift people, he might have gone to Devonshire or Brussels after Dr. Back, because having the means of knowledge, if he had used those means, he would have discovered there was a traffic in his patronage; and if he did not make use of those means he is guilty of knowing, because he might have known, and of conniving, because he might have prevented. and of participating and of abetting the other parties in their guilt, because he had the means of knowing; and if he had used those means he might have known, and if coming to the knowledge he continued to connive, just as he did when ignorant. then that connivance owing to that knowledge through those means, would have amounted to abetting: that is the argument-that is the logical nature of the argument, and the fairness of the argument. I will shew he did not do that; the moment he comes to know it, or suspect it, he says here is an irregularity here: I find there may be something wrong if I do not look sharp and serutinize the whole thing. But that is not the way I urge that fact, and that last fact came out to the wonder of any man who had heard the case opened by my learned friend, or had heard the case tried at all, and had seen this gallant officer, this respectable East-India Director, a worthy and an honourable man as his friends knew him to be, put upon his trial for a corrupt, for it is corrupt if at all, and wilful sufferance of his patronage being used by a set of swindlers, for aught I know, whom he knew nothing about-whose names he never heard, and of whom he knew no more than Dr. Backwhose name he never heard of at all till it was mentioned by Mr. Sutton: all this is found to be proved by the case laid before you by the evidence, one word upon which I am going to submit to you, if the attention you have already bestowed upon it, and the sagacity you bring to the sifting of it, renders one single comment upon that evidence needful.

Mow observe, gentlemen, Mr. Sutton was a neighbour; Mr. Sutton was an electioneering coadjutor and associate, and canvasser for this gentleman—Mr. Sutton asks him for a cadetcy, which he receive; and again asks him for a cadetcy, which he the one in question, which he never obtained, but was put in the way of obtaining: I call upon you attentively to observe that. Have you not the evidence of Dr. Back here, the remarkable evidence of Dr. Back, in this respect a witness of mine, though a witness for the prosecution, that when he was walking about, and I do not wish to press hard upon the character of Dr. Back-he may be a respectable man for all that has appeared here, men are a little lax when they are anxious to provide for young men, when they have large families-I do not justify it, it is not harmless to society, but it is very different to persons selling offices, and deriving a profit from the sale of offices which should be kept sacred to the public-but Dr. Back says, and nobody can doubt it, that when he was "walking about waiting for some steps of this negociation to be carried through, while we were walking near the India House, in a street by the side of it, Sutton said he hoped we had not been found out; if we were, he was a ruined man, and would lose his friend." Is that the speech of a man who had the least idea in his mind that his friend knew of it. Why, is it not self-evident he was saving to Dr. Back, his associate in this traffic, "pray take care, I hope to God we shall not be discovered; if we are, I shall lose my friend-I have been trafficking with his patronage-I have been abusing, foully abusing, the confidence he reposed in me, and he knows nothing of it-he still confides in me-he trusts me-I shall be runed, and lose that friend the instant I am found out by him-I have abused his confidence heretofore, and am now doing it, that is my case." You have heard that plain and distinct admission, forming a part of the case for the prosecution against Capt. Prescott, forming a part of the great transaction against Sutton, upon which the whole is built; a part of that is a declaration by Sutton in a moment of alarm, that his friend knew nothing about it, and if he did he would be ruined, and his friend's eyes would be opened to his conduct.

Then it is said that Col. Toone is a witness, to prove that my client, Capt. Prescott, borrowed in the usual way a cadetcy from Col. Toone, and filled it up irregularly, and wrote the recommendatory letter, or rather signed the recommendatory letter, and vouched for facts not within his own knowledge; and those are the only circumstances upon which this suspicion is attempted to be built, for the purpose of connecting Capt. Prescott with the guilt of these parties. This will require no long observation—it is the only part that remains to be commented upon. I speak with great respect of Col. Toone, with the greatest respect. He is an officer who has grown grey in the service of his country; who by his own account has been thirty years an East India director; who from the rank he has in the army, which it is matter of common notoriety to all of us, a man never rises beyond after he comes home save one step, it will not be disputed he must have come home a Colouel, or a least a Major, thirty years ago; and I think I assume very little when, without venturing to ask a question that might seem indelicate as to his age, I tell you he cannot possibly be, (I am sorry for it; for a more were rable looking officer, or a more worthy or a more gallant man, I have never met with in a court of justice to all outward appearance, and I believe that is the character heuniversally bears); when I tell you he is near fourscore years of age, for a man will not be made a Major or a Colonel, and an East-India director, on the bright side of fifty; and he has been thirty years in that eminent station.

If I was to say there was any thing confused in the evidence of this gentleman, or any thing in the slightest degree betokening a loss of memory, I should say what your experience of his evidence would contradict, and my own feeling upon the subject would flatly, and even loudly disavow; but when a man does not take a note at the time, which he did not, and when he did not suddenly afterwards have his memory refreshed and corrected, and directed to the particular facts, and the materiality of words which weigh much in such a case; when, at a distance of somewhat about a year, he is called upon to swear to those precise expressions, I must say that it does enter into my mind, that when at the time he is called upon to swear, he is about fourscore, as far as regards the perfect accuracy and minute nicety and correctness of recollection of a fact, or rather a conversation, which lasted a minute or two altogether (for he told it in about a minute), that was holden a year ago, and of which it is not pretended he took down any note of what dropped in conversation, which happened recently during the last year of his life, when, in all probability, he would more accurately recollect what had happened twenty years before, by a common rule of memory. Only see upon what a narrow point, upon what a very evanescent pivot, if I may use the term, the case turns, as it regards the evidence of Col. Toone. A single pause, a comma, a particle, a change of a word, makes all the difference between nothing at all, and that upon which my learned friend alone, or almost alone, relies in this case. He first said, "You know this gentleman;" he afterwards cor-rected the expression and changed it, when my Lord asked him what was the question, or what elicited that answer, he changed the word; he at first said, "You know the gentleman," but he afterwards said, "You are acquainted with the gentleman;" may I be allowed to say both my learned friend and myself observed it.

Lord Tenterden.—Yes, he said: first I asked him, do you know the gentleman? That mode of asking a question prevails very often, and I hear it very often in this part of the country.

Mr. Brougham. - A man very often says, do you know such a one? Does any man believe that Capt. Prescott would say, for the sake of his friend Mr. Sutton, that he would immediately begin to say to Col. Toone, "Oh, acquainted with him! I know him of my own knowledge." That is what is meant to be said; not, I know him through Mr. Sutton, but of my own knowledge I know Do you think Capt. Prescott would say, I know him perfectly well-he is one of the finest youths in England. know his father-he is a respectable I have no clergyman in Devonshire. doubt Capt. Prescott said that. He was asked, I dare say, is he a respectable Yes, he is a respectable clergyman: he had been in Devonshire. learned friend opened him as an eminent clergyman and tutor to the Duke of Richmond's son; and notwithstanding all that has passed, he is a respectable man, and I know that his family is the family of a respectable clergyman in Devonshire, and it turns out that he is so. The word is used in that sense. I beg you to recollect that, suppose he had said so, suppose he had said this, this would be no evidence to convict him of this foul and infamous offence. But I utterly deny that he said it, or that any man in his senses could have said it, without any one possible motive for so doing. But what he did say, was-what he must have said, was the truth, that he knew him through his then friend whom he then did not know, whom he now knows, whose authority he will take care of trusting to again, whom he will never allow any more to abuse his confidence, because knowing him now, and being ignorant of him at the time, he believed what Mr. Sutton told him; as I should a man I had known much less of; people under much lighter obligations than my learned friend stated that Capt. Prescott had been under to Mr. Sutton. Somebody must get his cadetcies. He is not allowed to traffic in them: is he to give them to friends or strangers? Is he to give them to one to whom he lies under no obligation, lest he should come under the severity of my learned friend's observations, of a person who does not traffic in office for lucre or gain, but gives away offices as a reward for past services? Is he, under that strict and fantastical feeling of morality, to look out for people whom he does not know? He is to take the representations of others as to the individuals; upon that he is to act, and so he does.

Now, gentlemen, see what follows-and this is the only other point; but the ground is cut from beneath the prosecutor's feet. I mean the last witness. Mr. Abington, who knows the mode in which the appointment was filled up, the usual way when I borrow of any one. -Suppose we were both directors-I wish we were-when I borrow of you a cadetcy, I, and not you, nominally make the appointment; and when I repay it to you, you, and not I, make the appointment; and accordingly that was followed: and if that had been followed in this case, you would never have heard so much as you have. This was followed in the case of the February appointment, because that worthy officer of the Company, Mr. William Abington, the principal in that department, who is clear and distinct in his manner-much more so than the deputy, Mr. Sharp-he knew how to fill it up, and the appointment is filled up in Mr. Abington's hand: he filled it up right, and sent it to the right person. It being a borrowed appointment, Capt. Prescott signed the nomination, and Sutton signed the recommendatory let-

But, gentlemen, now comes the appointment in question; he had promised Mr. Sutton a cadetcy; he is told that it presses, that the young man is within two months of being twenty-two; my learned friend says five months; he was of age in October, according to his father's account, and this happened in April, and, says my learned triend, he ought to have known it from the parish register when it came to be looked into, or he ought to have observed by the appearance of the young man, whether he wanted two months or five; here is another wilful and knowing misrepresentation; it turns out he wanted five months; he hurried the appointment, he goes to the India House and gets Sharp, the man whom you have seen today so clear in his recollection and his manner of expressing himself, that he answered a question three different times three different ways; the gentleman comes to him, and he says this is the way you ought to do: but says the Captain I do not think so, I think that is irregular, will not it be irregular? Suppose Captain Prescott, and that is the supposition upon which the whole of the case is bottomed, suppose Captain Prescott was anxious to deviate from the regular and usual way -that instead of giving the nomination in his own name, and Sutton signing the recommendatory letter, he was desirous of giving it in Colonel Toone's name, what business had he to raise objections, when Sharp, without any knowledge on his part, happened luckily for his purpose to fall into the snare, and offered himself a willing assistant to this operation to change the name, to keep back Sutton's name? name? That is the story, that it would look ugly Suttop appearing twice when Sharpe had enabled him to accomplish it, and to ful it up in this way, Colonel Toone giving the appointment, he signing the recommendatory letter. I do pray you to attend to this, for in my mind it is quite decisive upon the question; the whole question turns upon this aye or no, did not Captain Prescott voluntarily sign a recommendation, what Mr. Sutton might know of his own knowledge, what Sutton might have told him upon his knowledge. but signing it as if he knew it himself, he did so or did he not do so, is the question, for the purpose of keeping back Sutton's name from the India-House, and enabling Sutton to sell it? how could he possibly stand better in the execution of this purpose than when Mr. Sharpe comes and voluntarily throws himself into his hands as an agent for this purpose; fill up and nominate, and you sign the recommendatory letter? what is the answer of this honorable man, clearly shewing he did not harbour a thought of taking any such advantage that he had no such scheme in view, and had no wish to step beyond the ordinary course of promotion, or to deviate a moment to favour Sutton, and make Colonel Toone sign, though himself recommended instead of Mr. Sutton; what does he do? He says will not it be irregular to Sharpe? he objects to Sharpe's plan; he says this is not the right plan, will it be regular or not? That is said to be, according to the scope of my learned friend's argument, the very object he makes all the difficulty, and raises the objection about; Sharpe would never have dreamt of it. Sharpe proposed it. He says will not it be irregular, Sharpe? Sharpe says yes; but upon the whole I think you may do it in this way, because Col. Toone gives the appointment, and you know something, and Col. Toone does not-Col. Toone knows nothing of the individual, and he must nominate, and you must sign the letter. Then he proposes another thing, but about that there is so much obscurity that you cannot rely upon it, for you see that Sharpe is the witness for the prosecution, whose want of clearness, if it remained in the case, must puzzle the prosecutor's case and not mine Mr. Sharpe's testimony, if it is fatal to my learned friend, must rend the fabric of the prosecution, and not the fabric of my case. Sharpe, take him as a right witness or a wrong witness, as a clear witness or a confused, he says he proposed writing a letter to Col. Toone. I do not say what follows, there is some doubt upon it: but it is clear he proposed writing the letter to Col. Toone, to which Capt. Prescott added, "I have put Col. Toone to so much trouble, I do not wish to put him to any more." Then it is made out in an incorrect way, which Mr. Abington never would have done, which Mr. Abington in February did not do, but owing to Sharpe's blunder, and Capt. Prescott not wishing to give unnecessary trouble to Col. Toone, it is made out in an irregular way, which leads to difficulty and delay. Now then, having come to this part of the case, the evidence of Col. Toone and the evidence of Mr. Abington cut down all the ground they had to stand upon. Colonel Toone got a little annoyed; something occurs to him afterwards, and he writes a letter to Capt. Prescott, which is given to Capt. Prescott's servant, and the servant is not called to shew that Capt. Prescott received it. I cannot call Capt. Prescott to say he never received it; he has said, and now says, he never received it, and that is just as good as their saying they delivered it to the maid-servant. But suppose he received that letter-I will make a present of that to them-what was it? It was a letter stating Col. Toone was difficulted about the business, and desired nothing further to be done until the young man was seen and inquired about. What is my learned friend's charge? That we had the means of knowledge, that we were aware of the workings of his mind: and notwithstanding we were aware of his puzzle, and the anxiety, the workings, the doubts and suspicions which he never declared, he never said, all is not right, take care, inquire, examine your friend Sutton, whoever it is, he may have de-ceived you-sift the matter, use your means of knowledge; but because he said something that indicated he had a doubt about it, and because he wrote a letter desiring that the thing might be partially stopped, we are to be presumed guilty. How does the thing turn out? Col. Toone writes to Mr. Abington to stop the appointment; he is alraid that that might not reach, and he sends a second letter. What does Mr. Abington say? that early in the week, he will not say whether Monday or Tuesday, but before Wednesday he was certain, Mr. Prescott himself said, I desire that this appointment may be stopped; let nothing further be done in it; on no account let the thing go into the Board; on no account let the young man pass until he is seen-by whom? by Col. Toone himself; being the very man that makes the objection; by the person whose appointment I am giving away, and who is putting me in his turn; that is my object. I speak by hearsay, and I know nothing but what my friend Sutton has told me, whom I have hitherto found no reason to complain of; but Col. Toone has doubts. Let no hurry take place, though the young man's time may draw near; let no appointment take place until Col. Toone has seen the young man. Is not there, I ask, an end of the prosecution? not there an end put to this case by this answer of Mr. Abington's Is not every one thing in the evidence of Col. Toone explained that at first seemed to be a ground of suspicion to the mind, and was so used by my learned friend in his statement to you, in order to make it appear that Col. Toone was a much more cautious man, and much fonder of using his means of knowledge than Capt. Prescott, who acted rashly and hastily, in order to connive at, and encourage, and back up this friend of his, Mr. Sutton, this electioneering friend of his, in his attempt to sell his cadetcy; that Col. Toone was to be praised, and Capt. Prescott blamed, because Capt. Prescott hurried it over, and Col. Toone stopped it. Do I deny the fact? My denial avails not; the witness for the prosecution rebuts it; he has sworn it was Capt. Prescott himself who stopped the promotion, that Col. Toone might be satisfied.

Now, gentlemen, one word more upon the way in which people sign these re-commendations. When a man attests upon his own knowledge, and attests that which he knows not to be true, or when he pretends to know that which he cannot have knowledge of, he may be said to be doing an irregular thing by giving his certificate. But what do those persons who sign the answers declare? Col. Toone, whose hand I have it under, says, "I do hereby declare, to the best of my belief, that the petitioner's answer to the foregoing questions are correct:" and Capt. Prescott certified no more, when he said he believed what Sutton told him, than Col. Toone did when he says, under his own hand, that he believes what Capt. Prescott told him; that must be evident to every attentive mind. But observe the easy course that Capt. Prescott had to accomplish his object, if he had this view. It is clear that Col. Toone, by signing this nomination, which he did without hesitating, would not have thought it so regular, and he appears to be a man who steers upon the outside line of regularity and punctilious correctness. It is clear that Col. Toone thought there was nothing irregular in his nominating, though Capt. Prescott ought to have been the name: he does not object to it-he signs it; but certainly upon this nothing could have been more easy than for Capt. Prescott to make Col. Toone give the nomination at once to Mr. Sutton, in which case Capt. Prescott's name never would have appeared. Send me your cadetcy, my friend Sutton will sign, and then, instead of my name appearing on the books of the India House, connected with the name of Sutton, as giving him a second cadetcy, it would appear that I gave him one and that you gave him another: he would never have objected to that The evidence all shows that he would have done it; he signs the nomination, although it is a slight and almost harmless irregularity; the most usual way is that the person who borrows, signs, and here the man who lends, signs; and so that object is very commonly avoided. But see how easily this supposed guilty purpose could have been accomplished by this gentleman; he does this very thing which increases his difficulty, and in the end frustrated his at-tempt. If he had got it from Colonel Toone, and Sutton had recommended to Toone, or if he, without waiting for Sharpe's observation, had said that is another thing, he avoided; if you say this is the way to do it, why do I object to it? and inquire whether it is regular or not. there would have been an end of the question not only hours ago, but a year ago; but it is because he prefers taking the other and less irregular course, and when Mr. Sharpe suggests one thing, raising difficulties against himself according to my learned friend's view of the case, but nothing against himself according to my view of the case, because he had nothing to conceal, he says is there not a difficulty? and that leads to the conversation you have heard.

Then, gentlemen, you have it said that Mr. Abington's name is used in writing the letter to Colonel Toone. beg to say that is the regular course: it comes from that department, it does not come from the study of Mr. Prescott; the papers go to the office, they are pre-pared there, and signed there; they go through the office, and it is regular that Mr. Abington should have done it; if not, do you think Captain Prescott would have put himself in the hands of that young man for an irregularity? you think he would have made him an accomplice? But he says, take Mr. Abington's name in the usual way, and write the letter to Colonel Toone, that this is the appointment he is to fill up. He does not suppress one name, he does not conceal Captain Prescott's name; he says, write in Mr. Abington's name, but it is by my desire; so that the letter got to Colonel Toone in a way not to deceive any human being. It is Mr. Abington's compliments, and he is desired by Captain Prescott to send the enclosed papers to Colonel Toone; and then they are carried on to the house of Captain Prescott by the messenger who had received them from the commodore; he says my order was, after I had received them, to carry them on to Captain Prescott; which is just to avoid going backwards and forwards from Colonel Toone's to the India House, and then back again to Captain Prescott's, Captain Prescott's being the ultimate destination, and there being no earthly conceivable purpose for making three trips instead of one.

Gentlemen, you have already heard the respectable character of this gentleman from Mr. Astell; you shall hear it from others. They have not called the chairman who ordered the prosecution, nor the deputy-chairman who concurred in it, who is likewise a prosecutor; and we have no opportunity of knowing from them what passed in the year after the indictment was preferred; but I shall call before you his brother directors, who are also the prosecutors, who know the inquiries that have been made, and the motives for this proceeding, who will give you their opinion as to the high and unsullied character borne by this gentleman, whom you are called upon, on no better evidence than these surmises, that I have now shewn you are sought by false construction, ingenious perversion, and by exaggerated statement, to be wrung from these plain, innocent facts; upon no better grounds, by your verdict, you are called upon to consign him to infamy for the rest of his life, as guilty of the foul offence of conspiracy.

Mr. Starkie .- May it please your Lordship, Gentlemen of the Jury :- It now devolves upon me to make a few observations to you upon the case of Mr. Despard, who I believe stands the fourth defendant upon this indictment. Gentlemen, though he is a person in much humbler circumstances than the gentleman whom my learned friend, Mr. Brougham, has been lately defending with so much eloquence and zeal, he is a person of good family, and bears his Majesty's commission, whose reputation and liberty are as dear to him as those of any person, however exalted his rank; and I trust, gentlemen, you will favour me with a continuance of that attention which throughout the evidence you have paid to this case, because upon your decision must depend the question, whether my client is to maintain that reputation he has hitherto sustained, or depart this court a ruined and degraded man.

Gentlemen, although my observations in this case must be very short, inasmuch as there is but a very small part of the evidence that relates to the case of my client Mr. Despard, before I proceed to make those observations, allow me to state what is the real charge against him. Gentlemen, the voluminous indictment I hold in my hand, containing no less than thirteen counts, will resolve itself substantially into the question whether Mr. Despard did corruptly, for gain's sake, negotiate the obtaining a commission for a person of the name of Back; for though the counts are differently framed, it will be found that in Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No.148.

every one of them that specific charge is repeated, that the parties did corruptly, for gain's sake negociate; and should you be satisfied that my client had any knowledge of what was passing between these parties who have pleaded guilty, and against whom had they pleaded not guilty, the evidence given to day would be fully sufficient and overwhelming, I say, should it even appear before you to-day, upon the testimony of Dr. Back, that Mr. Despard knew at the time the transaction was going on that a cadetship was to be obtained; I apprehend still, unless he did according to the words of the indictment, corruptly and for gain's sake take a part in the negociation, he will be entitled to a verdict of acquittal at your hands.

But, gentlemen, it must have been apparent to you long ago that the evidence against my client depends upon the testimony, and wholly upon the testimony of the first witness called, Dr. Back, for I believe there is not one other of the numerous witnesses called on the part of the prosecution who gives an iota of evidence that can in any way affect Mr. Despard.

Now, gentlemen, certainly it is my duty on this occasion to state to you those circumstances which, according to my humble apprehension, ought to create a doubt in your minds, or the mind of any one who has heard that gentleman give his evidence, how far they ought to credit the testimony he has given, unsupported by documentary evidence, or the testimony of any other witness, or the probability of the case. You find Dr. Back, who is introduced as a respectable clergymen, and having resided upon the Continent many years, at last obtained a living, I believe the living of Little Hampton.

Mr. Gurney .- No, he only lives there. Mr. Starkie .- He lives there without any living; but he is a doctor of divinity, and you find that this person is attracted by an advertisement in the Morning Herald newspaper of the date of the 11th August 1826. Now, gentlemen, observe the part he acts upon this occasion; if he had acted fairly and honourably to obtain a place for his son, what necessity was there for his resorting to a cloak, and assuming the false name he did upon that occasion. And I beg leave of you to bear in mind, as I have no means of calling a witness to contradict Dr. Back, and as the confidence you place in his testimony or withold from him must depend upon collateral circumstances, because I cannot call witnesses to contradict what took place, as he says, between my client and himself, it is my duty to make such observations as will lead to the conclusion whether you will believe him or not.

What is the conduct of Dr. Back? instead of doing what any respectable man would have done, gone in his own name to inquire into the circumstances. because he did not at that time apprehend there was any thing irregular in the transaction at that time; what is the account he gives you? "I happened to have a card of Col. Edwards in my pocket, it was by accident, and I thought I would represent myself as Col. Edwards;" and then he goes with this base misrepresentation in his mouth, and represents himself as Col. Edwards, which name he assumes throughout the whole transac-I was a little anxious to learn who this Col. Edwards was, because it is from little circumstances that juries come to a clear knowledge of facts, and especially the character of those who give such testimony which cannot be contradicted in any other way. I asked him who was Col. Edwards, because it was possible he might know something of the name; that gentleman might have left a card at Dr. Back's house, or it might have been delivered to him at his house. But what is his answer? That Col. Edwards was the first husband of Dr. Back's present wife, and that he died so long ago as 1819, or rather he married in 1819, so that, reckoning from that date, he must have died of course some time before that; but reckoning from that date, you will find he had the card of a person who had been dead for seven years by him; that he had got a store of such cards, he had got not fewer than 100 of such cards; whether that is an account that satisfies you, or whether he did this for a fraudulent purpose, representing himself as Col. Edwards, it will be for you to decide.

Then, gentlemen, afterwards he says he was surprised to find that a price was expected for the cadetship for which he applied. Do you think it possible that could have been the real reason of Dr. Back breaking off the communication, because a price was asked for the situation he wished to procure for his son? Is it consistent with the common practice, that valuable situations desirable for a son are disposed of gratuitously? Your knowledge of the world will bring you to a very different conclusion from that. TF you refer to the advertisement, it will be apparent from the very terms of that advertisement that that was not intended, for the advertisement was read, and by that it is stated that the outfit will require means, and no person need apply who cannot supply means; and, gentlemen, it is impossible for men of your understanding to come to any other conclusion upon this subject, than that this was a mere pretence of Dr. Back to break off this negociation, and take the course he did: for you will find that after this, in February, he makes a disclosure of the subject to the East-India Company. Now at what time any disclosure took place, as far as any collateral testimony goes, you have no evidence whatever. I put to him some questions, which he answered thus: "I made a communication to the East-India Company in February I had much communication upon the subject "-and with respect to the time even, he might have been confirmed by the production of these letters, because they must have been in the possession of the prosecutors-it rests upon his sole testimony that he gave that information to the East-India Company, and had been induced, without any other motive. to come forward. Now, except that he was acting in collusion with certain persons in the way of being detected, and he chuses to become the agent and informant of the East-India Company, and buy impunity, if not patronage, for his son; and you see after that time he becomes a spy, after being an informer or agent for the East-India Company; that is a circumstance upon which I mean to impute no blame to the Company, because we know in many instances it is impossible, without the assistance of agents and spics, and persons not of the most respectable character in the world, that the ends of justice can frequently be obtained; but in all the cases upon the subject that I have been aware of, it has been the universal rule, that where a party is capable of confirmation to shew that the communication was fairly and bona fide made, and was going on with the concurrence of his employers, it has been the universal rule to produce that confirmation. Probably you have attended in court when prosecutions used to take place for passing forged Bank of England notes: in all those cases, the constant practice, according to my experience, has been, that although it was necessary on the part of the Bank to hire persons, who under false names introduced themselves to persons guilty of illegal dealings, yet there was always in those cases full evidence to confirm them in all the collateral parts of the evidence that such agents had given: for instance, where a party has been employed to purchase forged notes, nothing is more common than for the constable or person who employs him, to mark the money to be given to the person who obtains them, in order that the person may not be without confirmation, that the party may be taken up with the money in his pocket, and that the evidence of the agent may receive such a confirmation. Now in this case, circumstances have been stated, which if they were true this party might have been confirmed again and again; for these letters, which he says he wrote to the East-India Company, must have been in the custody of the prosecutors, and might have been produced to-day, and those letters would have been strongly confirmatory, if any such had existed, of the testimony he has given to-day. There is also another circumstance, and a very material one, upon which this person might have been confirmed, and that is, vou observe that he not only refreshed his memory, but read copious passages from the notes he had; those notes he asserted, upon cross-examination, were shown from time to time to the agent of the East-India Company. the East-India Company. Now, gen-tlemen, certainly that would have been a most material corroboration if they had shewn, or called the witnesses to prove that, night after night, when these conversations had taken place, he did detail conversations and produce writings. and certify that writing, and shew beyond the possibility of doubt that this was the report that this informer gave from time to time.

Gentlemen, there is another circumstance that might have been proved: he says notes to a very large amount, £500 and £300, were actually in the possession of some of these parties, not in the possession of my client, nothing of that sort is proved; but these notes were in the possession of the parties who have pleaded guilty; and I ask again, why are not the parties called? Why are not the agents of the East-India Company called, who could have sworn to the delivery to Dr. Back of these notes, to the amount of £500 and £300, to be used for these purposes?

Thus it stands upon the testimony of Dr. Back; and I ask you whether considering that Dr. Back is the sole witness who gives the slightest particle of testimony against Mr. Despard, whether you are prepared to say you will give such implicit credit to the statement he has made, considering the circumstances under which he has given his evidence, so as to consign a person who has filled the situation of my client, to utter ruin and degradation? But, gentlemen, even supposing you should be of opinion that any part of Dr. Back's statement is true, still I submit to you, and with considerable confidence, that even taking that to be true which he has stated, it would not warrant you in pronouncing a verdict of guilty against my client, because at most it only shows that something was said about this negociation, at the time he was present, between these persons, Gibbons and Dr. Back ; but it is not pretended by that evidence that Mr. Despard took any part in the negociation, and therefore even should you be of opinion that he had some knowledge of what was loing on, yet I apprehend, with great abmission to his Lordship, unless you can come to the conclusion that he did corruptly, for gain's sake, negociate or conspire, or do some act for the purpose of furthering an illegal object, although it might have been better had he separated himself at once from that society, he is not within that offence which is charged upon this indictment.

Gentlemen, there is one circumstance which I ought also to observe upon, that Dr. Back, in the course of his evidence has styled him with the title of "captain." I believe he is not entitled to the rank of lieutenant; but you must know that in the British army, in the regular forces, I understand, gentlemen, he does fill the situation of captain, and that he was rightly called by Dr. Back. But you are fully aware, I have no doubt, that though the sale of cadetships in the East-India Company's service is illegal, it is not any thing illegal to sell commissions in the regular army. In the act passed to make it illegal to be at all concerned in negociating the sale of cadetships, there is a clause enacting. " that nothing in that Act shall extend to any purchases, sales, or exchanges of any commissions in his Majesty's forces, for such prices as shall be regulated and fixed by any regulation, made, or to be made, by his Majesty, in that behalf, or to any act or thing done in relation thereto, by any agents." I merely mention this by the way, because military men, as my client Capt. Despard is, might not at the time advert to the legal distinction and the substantial distinction, which certainly there is, between the sale of an East-India Company's office and the sale of a commission in this country; and therefore he might not think, as some others might have thought, better informed on the subject. He is no lawyer; he is a halfpay officer. He did not at once say, you are doing a very scandalous thing; and leave them at once : you might think they were acting legally,

Mr. Gurney.—It you read the act of Parliament, you should read it correctly. The words are, "provided that agents shall be agents of regiments authorized by the commander-in-chief of his Majesty's forces, or by the colonels or commandants of regiments or corps."

Mr. Starkie.—I do not mean to justify it. He might easily suppose that, though his ignorance of the law would be no excuse. I only mean to say it may operate so far as to shew why he did not exclaim against their conduct. You observed the way in which Dr. Back gave his testimony. He produced a great number of notes before you, and read them copiously. He stated that all those notes were written at the same time.

Lord Tenterden.—No, he did not safethat.

In Starke. He said they were written at the time that each bears date. I should like you to see those notes, and you will judge, for instance, whether that was the case, or whether a great many of those entries have not been made at the same time, although they bear different dates; and also look at the original entries, and there you will find that those circumstances he afterwards stated, with respect to the conversation, are very different indeed, or wholly omitted; and when he reduced those conversations into writing does not appear.

But let us see what time it is, according to Dr. Back's account, that my client becomes a party to this transaction in the way in which he states it. The first time he speaks of seeing Capt. Despard is the 27th of April 1827; before that time he did not know there was any such person in existence. The negociation had at that time gone so far, that upon that day, or the day before, the half of a £500 note had been deposited with Mr. Gibbons, and Mr. Gibbons had given his re-ceipt for it. The negociation was to a great extent completed; the price had been agreed upon, and half of the note given; therefore there seems to be no earthly reason why he should be introduced by the other parties to conspire for this illegal purpose; there seems to be no earthly reason, when they had so far advanced as to obtain the half of a £500 note, why they should at all introduce Capt. Despard into their illegal partnership, with a view to give him any part of the profits; nor is there any part of the evidence that could at all satisfy your minds he was to have any part of those profits. It is not pretended, in these conversations, that he was to have any part, or that any money passed at the time he was there. You find, upon the 25th of April, the conversation was a very short one, and the utmost that Capt. Despard said at that time was, "You have been a long time about this, I would settle it very soon; I know Capt. Anstice," and it is very likely he did.

But does it follow he was advising them to an illegal negociation, because he knew Capt. Anstice could obtain a preferment of this kind? is it to be inferred that he meant illegally to obtain it? The conversation, as it appears to me, certainly does not go beyond that; it is merely stating that if he had known of the business sooner, he would soon have settled it. Then it appears, the next day, the parties are at Capt. Anstice's office, Capt. Anstice having been the friend of this party. The particulars of the conversation are not stated; all that is stated is, that Capt. Anstice add he half of the five hundred pound note, and that would be useless unless he had the half of a three hundred pound note, and that Capt. Anothe had not of Mr. Astell's appointments; it does not follow that he had them illegally; still less does it appear that Capt. Despard was to have any illegal share or benefit from the interest to be derived.

But there is another circumstance on my mind which is very strong, to shew that Capt. Despard was not to receive any part of this money; I allude to the particular time when the matter was to be finally wound up and settled, and when it was expected that this young man, the son of Dr. Back, would be passed at the East-India House: the remainder of the notes was to be produced, and those who were concerned in the transaction, and receive any part of the dividend and profits, were to receive their payments. But although it is stated that many of the parties who have pleaded guilty were there, it does not appear that Capt. Despard was there; and if he had so far committed himself as to have made himself a party to this illegal agreement, it will be for you to say whether he would not have been anxious to have received the price of his iniquity with the rest, and been in attendance at the Ship Tavern to receive the profits. You find. so far from that, that I think one of the witnesses stated, Dr. Back, I believe, that Gibbons said, as the cadetship had been bought for eight hundred pounds instead of nine hundred guineas, and he had got it for less than he ought to have had it for, that he ought to have fortyfive pounds, and Mr. Wright one hundred pounds, of the difference. Now, gentlemen, I think this evidence is available in this way. At the time they are talking of the participation of the money, at the time the money is being received. Capt. Despard is not then to receive any part of it, although the sharing of it is spoken of. Gentlemen, there is no evidence to shew that Capt. Despard was acquainted with any of these persons, except Capt. Anstice and Mr. Gibbons. With respect to the other parties who have pleaded guilty, they may have been perfect strangers to him up to the time of the transaction.

Now, gentlemen, under 'these circumstances, considering, in the first place, that even if Dr. Back's event much farther than it does; donisidering the situation in which he stands; considering the account he himself gives of himself, I submit he is not a person who stands so fairly and of such unsullied reputation before you, that you can safely conviet Captain Despard upon his evidence; and the more so which you consider that much evidence might have been given to support his character that has not been adduced. Then, gentlemen, its I have already observed.

557

ed, the probabilities of the ease are the other way; it is very improbable that Capt. Despard should have been admitted a participator in these profits; he did nothing, even allowing Dr. Back, who is not an unwilling witness, whose intent is probably to convict as many of the defendants as possible; he does not affect to say there was any hint given that that gentleman was to be a participator in this transaction. Gentlemen, having made these observations to you, I will not repeat them : the evidence itself is very brief against this gentleman, as my observations must have been. You know, as well as I do, that before a jury can come to a conclusion that a person is guilty of such an heinous ofence as this, it is not sufficient that they should have some general notion floating in their minds that all is not as it should have been; but they must be satisfied in their conscience that the party is really guilty; and they ought to exercise the same discretion with respect to the safety of a fellow-creature who stands before them, as if their own and most solemninterests were at stake. Gentlemen, a jury may, without any feelings of great emotion, afterwards remember, that perhaps they may have acquitted a guilty person; but, gentlemen, if I mistake not the feelings of every man amongst you, and every man of humanity, they must be bitter, indeed, if any circumstance subsequent to the trial should lead him to suppose he has been the instrument of convicting a fellow-creature, and ruining a man who was actually innocent. Gentlemen, under these circumstances, it is for you to say whether Capt. Despard was guilty of corruptly, and for gain's sake, negociating the obtaining this employment for this young man. I will not repeat those observaions I have made; I thank you for the attention you have paid to the whole of the case, and I have no doubt you will come to the conclusion that your consciences point out as being the proper one.

Evidence for the Defendant Prescut.
John Baker Richards, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is governor of the Bank of England; has known Capt.
Prescott more than thirty-five years.—
Q. What character during all that time has be borne?—A. I have always considered him to have borne—

Lord Tenterden.—How extraordinary it is that gentlemen of the education of those before us, will not answer the question put to them! the question asked is, what is his character?—A. Always that of an honest and honourable man.

John Masterman, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is a banker and East-India director. Has been acquainted with Capt. Prescott between eight and nine years he has always borne the character of an honourable and upright man.

Josias Dupré Alexander, Bag, estrained by Mr. Polloch.—Winness is a member of Parliament and an East-India disctor. Has known Capt. Precott since the year 1798, thirty years next October.—Q. What character has he borne during that time, for honour and integrity?—A. A remarkable good one.—Q. Have you had any means of knowing any thing of his conduct in the disposal of his patronage?

Lord Tenterden.—That is a question you cannot ask, that is a fact.

Mr. Pollock.—What character he has borne as to that particular point?

Lord Tenterden .- That is a different

Mr. Pollock.—What character has he borne in regard to the disposal of his patronage, has he borne any character?—A. I believe he has acted very fairly.—Q. What is his character upon that?

Lord Tenterden.—This is getting too near the objectionable point.

Mr. Gurney.—This is a fact: if you pursue it, I must cross-examine upon it.

Major Carnac, examined by Mr. Potlock.—Witness is an East-India director. Has known Capt. Freecost for about five years; during that time he has always borne the character of an honourable and benevolent man.

Charles Mills, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is an East-India director. He has known Capt. Prescott about eight years; during that time he has borne the character of a straight-forward honourable man.

Vice-Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm, examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness has known Capt. Prescott thirty-two years, in various situations; he has borne the character of an honourable, liberal, and open-hearted man.

Sir Charles Flint, examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is the sceretary of the Irish office. He has been acquainted with Capt. Prescott twelve years: during that time his character has been the highest possible.

H. Bonham, Esq., M. P., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is a member of Parliament. He has known Capt. Prescett about thirty-five years; during that time (witness thinks) he has borne the character of a very honourable, upright, geodnatured man.

Lewis Lloyd, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is a banker in this city. Has been acquainted with Capt. Prescott about ten years; during that time the character he has borne is that of a most upright and honourable man.

Colonel Frederick, examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness has known Capt. Prescott from the time of his birth; during all the time he has borne the character of a kind-hearted and homourable man.

William

William Curtis, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollook.—Witness is a partner in his father's house, Sir William Curtis and Co. as bankers. Has known Capt. Prescott about ten years; during that time he has borne the character of an honourable, honest, upright man.

Sir James Shaw, Bt., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness has known Capt. Prescott between ten and twelve years; during that time he has borne a character of the very highest description, an honourable man, and a frank, straight-forward seaman.

Robert Williams, Esq. and Thomas Wilson, Esq. called, but did not answer.

Cornelius Buller, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness was lately governor of the Bank of England, and is now one of the directors. Has known Capt. Prescott eight or ten years; witness has always understood him to bear the highest character.

Nicholes Brown, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is one of the commissioners of the Victualling-office. Has known Capt. Prescott fifteen or twenty years. The character he has borne is that of a plain, honest, upright-dealing man.

Capt. Luard, examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness has known Capt. Prescott about thirty-five years; during that time the character he has borne generally in the world, is that of an honourable and upright man.

John Capel, Esq., M.P., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is a member of parliament. Has known Capt. Prescott about twelve years; during that time the character he has borne is that of an honourable upright man.

Colonel Davies, examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness has been in the East-India Company's service. Has known Capt. Prescott about thirty years; during that time the character he has borne in the world is that of an honest and honourable man.

Isaac Robinson, Esq., examined by Mr. Pollock.—Witness is one of the elder brethren of the Trinity House. Has known Capt. Prescott thirty-nine years intimately; during that time he has borne in the world the character of a man of the highest honour and integrity, open-hearted and kind.

Mr. Brougham.—There are twenty or thirty more, but I do not trouble your Lordship with them; they come from different parts.

ferent parts.

Lord Tenterden.—Do you call any witnesses for the other defendant?

Mr. Platt .- No, my Lord.

Summing up.

Lord Tenterden.—Gentlemen of the jury: This, is an indictment against Samuel Sutton, William Andrews, James Patten Anstice, John Edward Despard, Joseph Tyndale, George Henry Gibbons, Thomas

Wright, and Charles Elton Prescott; and the indictment charges the seven persons first-named, that is, all except Mr. Prescott. with having conspired together for gain, reward, and profit, to negociate for one Edward Drake Back, to be nominated and appoint. ed to a certain employment, that of a cades under the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies : and then it charges that Captain Prescott. unlawfully, wilfully, and knowingly, aided, abetted, and assisted the other persons I have named. That form of charge is varied in the different counts, but the latter counts are all substantially the same, charging the first seven defendants with conspiring together unlawfully to obtain this appointment for this young man.

Mr. Gurney. The first count does not charge a conspiracy.

Lord Tenterden. It is that they unlawfully negociated for this appointment: there are several other counts of that class varying the charge as to negociating for gain and reward, all of them importing gain and reward, and that Captain Prescott aided and assisted them. Then there is another set of counts, which charges all the defendants, including Capt. Prescott, with combining and conspiring unlawfully and corruptly, for gain, reward, and profit, to Samuel Sutton, to recommend Edward Drake Back to be nominated and appointed to this office of cadet under the There are several East-India Company. counts in that class varying the charge, but not in any material degree. Then there is another count perfectly distinct from all the rest, which states that all the defendants conspired falsely and fraudulently, to cause and procure a false representation to be made to the Court of Directors of the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East-Indies, that young Back was a person with whose family and connexions Capt. Prescott at the time of such representation was well acquainted, for the purpose of obtaining for Edward Drake Back the nomination and appointment to the employment of a cadet, the defendant Prescott and all the other defondants being wholly unacquainted with his family and connexions.

Now, gentlemen, as it regards all these counts in this indictment, except the last, no person can properly be convicted upon it who is not in some way a participator in the unlawful scheme to obtain this appointment for profit and gain; I use the word participator, because that term has been employed by the counsel for one of the defendants; but in order to convict persons of a charge of this kind, it is not necessary in point of law that each of them should have in his mind to participate in the gain, for if they all combine to attain the object for profit and gain to some of them they are all guilty within the meaning of this charge. No person can be convicted upon these two first sets of counts, who is not conscious that gain and reward is the object of some of the defendants with whom he conspires; but it is not necessary that he. individually, should be one of those to mare: no person can be convicted if he is not conscious that those with whom he conspires have gain for their object, but it is not necessary that every one should participate. That is the law as regards this part of the charge, which is the most important part of it. The latter part is, that they all conspired falsely and fraudulently to cause and procure a false representation to be made to the East-India Company, that young Back was a person with whose family and connexions Mr. Prescott at the time of that representation was well acquainted.

1828.]

Now to this charge all the first class of defendants, except Despard, have acknowledged their guilt; five, I think, of them have pleaded guilty before we came into this place, and another of them desired that your verdict should pass against him; the only two persons now upon their trial are Capt. Despard and Capt. Prescott; those are the only defendants. The cass against them st nds upon very different grounds, and therefore it is necessary I should direct your attention to the evidence as it respects each of them separately and distinctly.

Now, the only witness called who speaks to any participation by the defendant Despard in this transaction is Dr. Back, and the account he gives of it is, that having seen an advertisement in a paper called the Herald, in the month of August 1826, professing to be addressed to parents and guardians, and representing that a permanent situation offered to a youth under twenty to go abroad, his outfit would require means, without which none need apply. That Dr. Back having a son, for whom he was desirous of obtaining some provision, wrote a letter addressed to Alsop's Buildings, and received an answer; and in consequence of that he called at the house in Alsop's Buildings, where he saw afterwards the defendant whose name is Wright. He says he took with him some cards, having upon them the name of Edwards, which was the name of the first husband of his present wife, many of which cards he had; and it is quite clear what the gentleman says, that it was natural, and we might suppose it would so happen, that he would not wish in the outset to appear personally, and he went throughout in the name of Colonel Edwards. Then he relates first his interview with Mr. Wright; then a letter from Mr. Wright representing his going out of town and referring him to Mr. Gibbons; he gives an account of his conversation with Mr. Gibbons and then depositing first one half of a £600 note, and the half of a £800 note; and he produces several lecters from Gibbons confirmatory of that and also two receipts from Mr. Gibbons.

Then he tells you in the next place Gibbons introduced him to Tyndale; that after a time he was introduced to the defendant Despard. Before, however, he was introduced to Despard, he had learnt from Mr. Wright that the sum required for the appointment was for a cadetship in the infantry, £600, but if in the cavalry, £800 or £900. He reached town in the year 1826, but finding the sum did not at all suit him he abandoned the negociation; but that in the spring of the following year his son, for whom the appointment was to be procured, coming of age, and being possessed of a sum of money, he was desirous to renew the negociation. However, before he did that he thought he would have some communication with the chairman of the East-India Company : he saw that gentleman then, and several times afterwards the solicitor of the Company, He was informed he was in great danger in what he was doing; that it was contrary to law, which he was not aware of, and with that caution he would have nothing more to do with it. But it was the wish of those who had the management of the affairs of the Company, and a very natural and proper feeling it was, to trace to the very bottom the persons thus professing to traffic in this appointment, and at the suggestion of the Chairman or the solicitor (the Chairman he puts it), he was desired to go on with the negociation, and to hold out he was willing to negociate with them. that the Company might find out who the parties were; and that he in consequence had made some communications from time to time to the Chairman or the solicitor. and that he made memoranda from time to time of the conversations and other parts of the transaction.

After the introduction to Tyndale, which is after both the sums of money had been paid, Tyndale introducing him to Despard, and Tyndale and Wright had pleaded guilty, he says, "on the 14th of April I met Gibbons and Tyndale, this was the first time I saw Tyndale; Gibbons shewed me an acknowledgment from Tyndale that he had received the half of the note for £500. On the evening of the same day Gibbons introduced me to Tyndale, and Gibbons then said that nothing could be done on that day, as there were no directors at the India-House; that we must wait till Monday," then the Easter Holidays were mentioned as a reason for delay: another reason was the unsettled state of the ministry; there was an intimation given that the appointment was to come from the President of the Board of Controul. The then president has been examined.

mined, and he has said, as might have been expected, that he knew nothing shout it. Then it appears that after the half of the £300 note had been deposited, on the same day the witness says "Tyndale introduced me to Captain Despard at Lloyd's Coffee-house ;" this is the first time that Captain Despard is introduced, he says, " Captain Despard lamented he had not been consulted sooner in the business, that if he had I should not have been detained so long in town; he would soon settle it." He says, "Gibbons left me at Lloyd's in company with Captain Despard, and promised to return in about a quarter of an hour: I waited for him four or five hours, but he did not come; Capt. Despard did return, and asked me if I had seen Gibbons since he had left; I replied no, and he expressed great astonishment that he had not. Then we appointed to meet the next day, and we did so, that is the 26th. I only met Capt. Despard on that day. He told me I should not be disappointed again for he would introduce me to two very respectable merchants; he then took me to the office of Capt. Anstice and Mr. Stubbs, at Great St. Helen's. Capt. Despard introduced me to Capt. Anstice, and Capt. Anstice then said he had had the half of the £500 note in his possession for some time, but that it was no manner of use until the half of a £300 note was also deposited." Capt. Despard is there at the time this passes; "before we went there Capt. Despard had said that Capt. Anstice had got most of Mr. Astell's patronage, and that this was supposed to be one of Mr. Astell's appointments." Mr. Astell is called, and he says, of course, he knew nothing about this, he being a director at the time. Then on the 27th he attended again at Mr. Anstice's office; they were running about from one place to another, he believes they were at Capt. Anstice's, and Capt. Despard called upon him again at the Monument Coffee-house, and said every thing would be completed by the next day; he says, " I was waiting at Capt. Anstice's office in very great anxiety, and expressed my doubt of the ability of the parties to procure the appointment, when Capt. Anstice said he would forfeit £100 if it was not completed the next morning; and if I would leave the young gentleman with him, if I wanted to go out of town, he would take care of him that the appointment would be forwarded to the house of the director who was to give it, who was in Hertfordshire, and that the director had declined signing it until the half of the £300 note was in Capt. Anstice's possession; that he had forwarded the appointment by post to this director, and he expected it by the return of post; he said the gentleman had been tired of waiting for the £300, and had expressed himself in very angry terms at the delay, and said he would wait no longer."

This is the last interview he mantions as having had with Capt. Despard; and if the account he has given of the part he took is correct, no doubt Despard was a party to this combination to obtain this money for the benefit, if not of himself, at least of others. If Dr. Back gives a clear representation, it is clear the matter of profit and the note are spoken of when Capt. Despard is present. It is said, you are not to believe Dr. Back; why not? It is said that the prosecutors ought to have called the Chairman or the solicitor of the Company; why are you to support the testimony of a man who is not in the least broken in upon by any thing that has taken place? What motives could he have to accuse a man of this crime of whom he had no knowledge? is it to be supposed that a man is to come forward and invent a charge of this kind? In another part of the story there is abundant confirmation by all the other parties pleading guilty, and confirmation as to many of them by the letters they have written; and it will be for you to ask yourselves, whether there can be any doubt in your minds upon what Dr. Back has said of the part that Capt. Despard took in this transaction; there is no reason why he should accuse him falsely.

Then he goes on with the further narrative, which I need not give in very minute detail; we come to the 28th, that is a material day connected with what appears afterwards with regard to Captain Prescott. He waits all that day in expectation that Capt. Anstice would come; Capt. Anstice went out with him and they endeavoured to find Mr. Andrews; they went to the office of Mr. Andrews, in Waterloo-place, but he was not there. " Capt. Anstice said that I had great reason to complain that I was ill-used. On the next day, the 29th, I saw Mr. Andrews at his house in Brook-street, Hanover-square. I saw Gibbons at Capt. Anstice's house on that day in St. John's Wood Road; Gibbons was talking to Anstice at the door of his house. Anstice said Gibbons wantto go with us to Mr. Andrews, and he would not allow it; we went there without him. We saw Andrews who said the appointment was certain; that the gentleman who was to give it was to be in town the next day, and he would bring the appointment with him to Great St. Helen's by two o'clock the following day; he also said he was sorry that he and I had missed each other the day before; that he wished to settle the business as much as I did, and that the money would be very useful to his client at that particular time; he said, "I was to keep it secret, and not to let the business transpire." The next day was Monday, the 30th; he went there by appointment. "I waited till four o'clock and Mr. Andrews did not come; at last be came and said, that his friend who was to give the appointment would be with him that evening, and if Capt. Anstice would call upon him in the afternoon in his way home to St. John's Wood Road, the hour for a meeting the next day should be fixed on that day; he also received a note from Gibbons. I need not read that.

On the 1st of May he says, "I went to Capt. Anstice's by appointment, there was a note arrived at Capt. Anstice's from Mr. Andrews, which Mr. Stubbs opened, and then the hand-writing of Mr. Andrews was proved, and that note was read, and in consequence of that letter he sent his son down to Mr. Andrews's office.

Then we come to the 2d of May. says on that day Mr. Andrews and Mr. Sutton came to him. Mr. Sutton is not introduced into the business till the very close, the 1st of May is the first day. Andrews very late, and Mr. Sutton not till afterwards. "I saw Mr. Andrews and Mr. Sutton, who called and said that as every thing was now complete, I ought to deliver them the two halves of the notes. he says he refused to do it till the young man had actually passed. They continued to press for the other half of the notes on our walk to the India-house, and as we were about to go into the coffee house, the Ship, when they did go in, he said he would come to them presently; wishing to consider of it, he went back and put the two halves of both the notes upon the table. Then there was a new difficulty started by Mr. Andrews or Mr. Sutton, that the corresponding halves were not there; they desired him to walk to the other end of the room, but before he did that he took up the half of the five-hundred pound note; he says, "I declared positively I would not give it up till the young man had been sworn in. My son was walking about waiting. We all went to the India-House together. I think Captain Anstice took up the other half. One of them took it, and having done that, the papers were put into his hands by one or other of them; that he went and found his son; he was waiting under the door of the India-House. The important part that affects Mr. Prescott is, that the papers traced into his hands on the Saturday and Monday evening are found in the hands of these men Sutton and Andrews, and by them delivered over to Dr. Back; he then went and found his son, and went to the cadet office, and Mr. Gibbons came to him there: that is not material. When they went to the office he gave the appointment to a clerk in the cadet office, who immediately disappeared with it. He went out of the room, and waited for him to come back till six o'clock, but the clerk who had taken away the papers Anatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148, never returned." Then he relates what passed between Mr. Gibbook, and him while the clerk was away; "he said you have got this appointment for $800 instead of 900 guineas, and he wanted to receive the difference between £800 and 900 guineas, being £145, and that he was to receive £45, and that Mr. Wright was to have £100. He left the India-House two or three times and went to the Ship, where he found Mr. Andrews, or Mr. Sutton, or both of them; they said, when I went, that I was detained so long at the cadet office that they thought there must be something wrong; they could not tell, what to make of it; there was something irregular, they were afraid. Before we parted Sutton walked with me into the street behind the India-House, I forget the name of the street; he said he hoped there was nothing wrong, for if the matter was found out he should be a ruined man. He appointed to meet him the next day, to tell him what turn things had taken, but he did not go; he came afterwards to him at Little Hampton—nothing particular pass-ed—he begged particularly to know what was said when he was before the directors. or what was going forward: but the witness told him he should have nothing to say to him upon the subject. Captain Prescott he never saw in his life—he thinks his son was baptized on the day of his birth in October 1805, so that in the early part of 1827 he would not be 22.'

Then he is cross-examined, on behalf of Captain Despard. He says, " he never went but upon this occasion in the name of Edwards, or by any other name—there is no proof that he did. That was when he went to negotiate for the office. He says he was usually dressed in black, he might have on a black silk handkerchief, he had been in the habit of wearing black silk handkerchiefs; he has worn an undress military coat and yellow waistcoat upon the Continent, as persons often do, and that he has worn a blue camlet cloak, but never in their presence; that the cards were Colonel Edwards's, who was the first husband of his present wife-they were preserved, they were found in some drawer or some such thing-he never went by the name of Drake on the Continent, he always went by his own name; he was on the Continent some years; he was chaplain to a foreign garrison, and he was private tutor to one of the sons of the Duke of Richmond.

The remainder of the evidence is introduced to affect the defendant Mr. Prescott. The first witness who speaks with regard to him is Colonel Toone, who is a director of the East-India Company, and has been so thirty years. He says Mr. Prescott has been for some years past a director, and he served with him seven years in the direction, which made him acquainted with him. He says the directors fill up the patronage in their turn, and sometimes they lend them to each other. If a particular director wishes an appointment for a friend, he gets it from a brother director and gives him another. In the latter end of April last year Mr. Prescott applied to him for an appointment by a note, and that note is to ask him if he can let him have a turn in the Madras cavalry. He met him in the street, and told him he should be happy to accommodate him, having a great respect for him, and that there was no man in England, Scotland, or Ircland, whom he would be more willing to oblige—he evidently thinks very highly of him. The next day he met him and spoke to him about the nominationit is not material to inquire what that was; but he thinks on the following morning, or the next day but one, he spoke to the defendant, Captain Prescott, and he told him something had happened that made him very anxious about the promise he had made. "I said do you know the young man perfectly well? He said ves, he is one of the finest youths in England. I said, do you know his family? he answered yes, I know his father, he is a respectable elergyman in Devonshire. He said it was necessary to quicken the. matter as the young man was within two months of being of age-that means twenty-two, and after twenty-two he could not be appointed. He said, I suppose you ask these questions in consequence of some appointment three or four months ago, and I said I did, it was in consequence of that : he said he knew this young gentleman very well, and his father was a clergyman in Devonshire.

4 D

Now whatever character this gentleman Mr. Prescott may have borne, if Col. Toone speaks the truth, it is clear he was representing that which was false and untrue; he takes upon himself to say he knows the young man, and he was as fine a youth as any in England, that he only wanted two months of twenty-two, and that he knew his father, who was a clergyman in Devonshire, he never in his life having seen either the father or the son, and having no knowledge of them.

He says, "after that conversation I sent a note to Mr. Abington, who is the chief clerk of the cadet office, through which this appointment must pass—it is in these words: "William Abington, Esq. Be so good as to pass Capt. Prescott's youth without delay, as he is near twenty-two, and I will sign the papers on Wednesday morning next; but let the youth pass as soon as possible." Then he puts a post-script: "If the papers are sent to me this day I will sign then." He says, on the same day I received a packet, purporting to come from the head of the cadet office, enclosing those two papers A and B. the papers were shewn to the witness, he says I signed them and enclosed them, and sealed them up, and directed them to Mr. Abington at the India-House, the same day by one of the messengers of the India. House, who waited for an answer:" he says, "I was called for from dinner and signed the papers;" and suddenly some. thing occurred to him afterwards that he had signed what he would not willingly have done; he says it was contrary to his practice to sign till he had seen the individual; that he wrote a note to Mr. Abington and sent it by the twopenny post. Now the note to Mr. Abington is-"I signed the papers you sent me this evening, but before the matter is finally concluded, I request you will contrive to let me see the youth, and with that view I will call at the India-House on Monday next, and I will attend there before twelve o'clock, and request the youth to attend at twelve on Monday next; then he says he sent a note by his servant to Mr. Prescott the same evening; then Joseph Williams says, he is servant to Col. Toone, that his master sent him with a letter to Cant. Prescott's about April in the last year, he took it to the defendant's house and delivered it to a female servant there; that he never took more than one letter from his master to Capt, Prescott; therefore that letter, taken in connexion with the evidence of Col. Toone, must be the letter. Then that not being produced, Col. Toone goes on to say, that the note to Mr. Prescott also stated that he had received the papers which had been sent to him by Mr. Abington, and that he had signed the papers; "but it occurred to me, I had not seen the young man, contrary to my practice, and that I had written to him my order that Mr. Prescott's cadet should not pass until I had seen him." The letter to Mr. Abington is produced to you, and it has the post-mark of Monday; the letter to Mr. Prescott is not produced, and on Monday he sent another letter; he is very anxious about it, and fearing the letter might be lost, he sent his servant again the next morning with the following. " The young gentleman, nominated to my Madras cavalry nomination, for which I returned the papers yesterday, is not to be presented and passed until Col. Toone has seen him, and with that view Col. Toone will attend at Mr. Abington's office as soon as possible on Monday morning, (signed) S. Toone."—He says, "On that same Monday I went to Mr. Abington's office at the India-House: I never saw the cadet, and never have seen him; I remained at the office two hours and he did not arrive; I received no answer from Mr. Prescott to the letter I sent on Saturday evening. I do not recollect any other conversation I had with him. I did not enter into it, for I had the greatest regard for him. Mr. Prescott did not give me any answer, either by letter or by calling on me. I was not apprized that any order had been given at the time by the Chairman or Deputy Chairman; they kept it very properly to themselves. Then he is cross-examined by the counsel for Mr. Prescott, and he says there was an inquiry among the directors afterwards. That the directors dine together on court daysthat is all immaterial.

Then the next witness called is Edward Drake Back, the young man who was to have the appointment. He says he recollects being in town with his father the latter end of April or the beginning of May 1827; he recollects going on the morning of the 2d of May to No. 8, Waterloo Place, Mr. Andrews's office; that he saw him there, and he believes he saw Mr. Sutton there; Mr. Sutton is in court, and says, he believes he was one of the persons. There he saw the papers produced, A and B; and then he says, that he wrote the answer to the fourth question, that is, who recommended you to Sweny Toone, Esq., the nominating director for this appoint-Aus. Charles Elton Prescott, ment? Esq, which name was in pencil, for him to write in ink; " I never before that heard the name of Capt. Prescott or knew him;" he looks at the other paper B, and says, that is his signature Edward Drake Back. This I think was done on Wednesday morning; he also signs the other paper. which is the signature to the petition of Edward Drake Back to the directors, exmessing his desire to go. That he left the two papers with those two persons; that one of them told him to go to the Monument Coffee-house and they would be there almost as soon as he was; he returned to the Monument Coffee-house, and he afterwards waited about the India-House for his father, and he then afterwards went into the Cadet-office with his father. Some person desired him to go in and said he was to be introduced to Mr Prescott, he went into the room and saw a gentleman, but he cannot identify Mr. Prescott; whoever that gentleman was, he merely asked him whether he liked to go, and whether he had ever been in the army. He says he knew very little about the arrangement, he only knew that the business was going on merely to detert these people; he says, he wrote answers to the different queries.

Then the next person called is Frederick Haldane, a clerk in the cadet-office, who says, "in the month of April 1827, Mr. Prescott sent for me, and when I came he asked me if I understood that letter; I said I did; I took up the letter to the office and deposited it in the case where it is usual to deposit such letters; he desired me to write it off, that is, I mark off the appointment in the book." He did so, and that denoted that Col. Toone's nomination was transferred to the defendant, He saw Colonel Toone in the office on the Monday following; he thinks he also saw him on the Saturday; he said he lamented the circumstance of having lent Mr. Prescott the nomination, but directed that the gentleman was not to pass till he had seen him. "On the 2d of May a paper was brought to my office which I immediately took, and gave it into the hands of the deputy secretary." Then the papers A and B are produced; I will direct your attention to them presently.

563

Then the next witness is Edward Sharpe, who is a clerk in the cadet office. consequence of a message he attended upon Mr. Prescott on the 28th of April in his room; he produced a note from Col. Toone, intimating a compliance with his wish to give him an appointment, and for the papers to be sent up to Col. Toone for his signature; he also produced the paper marked A. and asked me if it was complete. He says, " I told him it was not complete; that the letter of recommendation was not filled up, and the fourth question was not answered: the other parts were complete; he then asked me how the letters of recommendation should be filled in. I said, if Colonel Toone signs the nomination, Capt. Prescott ought to sign the first letter of re-commendation." It seems they are not both to be signed by the same person. "He said, 'is not that irregular?' I said that it was, but that since Col. Toone was to sign the nomination it was necessary for him (Mr. Prescott) to sign the letter, as I presumed Col. Toone knew nothing of the other parties. I also filled in the fourth question by the desire of Capt. Prescott, and he then signed the letter. He says he had asked me to fill in the letter, I did so, and he signed it, and then that recommendation is this "Gentlemen, I do hereby declare upon my honour that I received the nomination of a cadet for the Madras cavalry from Sweny Toone, Esq. gratuitously, and that I have given it gratuitously to Mr. Edward Drake Back, with whose family and connexions I am well acquainted; "that is signed by himself," C. Elton Prescott.

Then the witness said something about a conversation between them as to the writing of the letters, but the witness was so indistinct in his answers, and represented he had received the same answers in two or three different forms, that it seems to me you could not rely upon that part of the conversation and our safer course is to take that part that the witness speaks to without hesitation. " He directed me to fill up the nomination and send it to Colonel Toone for signature." That in consequence of a note he had received from Colonel Toone he would not give him any further trouble; he says "if Capt. Prescott had signed the nomination, and the recommendation had been signed by the person to whom it was given, it would not have given Colonel Toone any additional trouble." The director's nomination Esq., being one of the Directors of the East-India Company, beg leave to present the petitioner as a cadet for the Madras cavalry on Mr. Morris's nomination of the season 1826, provided he shall appear to you eligible for that station. And I do declare that I have inquired into the character, connexions, and qualifications of Mr. Edward Drake Back, and that in my opinon he is a fit person to petition the East-India Company for the appointment he now herein solicits. S. Toone." He filled that in by Mr. Prescott's desire; he speaks without hesitation to that. " After I had filled in the nomination, Mr. Prescott desired me to write a note, transmitting them to Col. Toone. I wrote a note in Mr. Prescott's name, and took it to Mr. Prescott for his approval, but he did not approve of it; and desired me not to write it in his name, but to write it in the name of Mr. Abington, the chief clerk; he was not that day at the office; I prepared a note accordingly in Mr. Abington's name, and enclosed the two papers, and directed them to Col. Toone, and gave them to the commodore of the messengers, John Salter. Mr. Prescott desired me to tell the messenger to take the packet to Col. Toone, to wait for an answer, and bring it to his (Mr. Prescott's) residence." Then he says the note was in Mr. Abington's name, and mentioned only that the papers were transmitted to him by Capt. Prescott's desire. Then he proves Mr. Prescott's signature. Then the papers were read. He says the filling up in February is in Mr. Abington's hand.

Then Salter is called, the commodore of messengers, who produces a book in which he enters the direction of the letter, and to whom he delivered it; and he says that he delivered it to Sullivan, with such directions as were delivered to him. Sullivan says he received it and took it to Col. Toone's house, and watted there as directed, and took it back, not to Mr. Abington, but to Mr. Prescott's house.

Then Mr. Abington is called, who says he was absent from the office from indisposition on the 28th of April; that he was at the office either on the Monday or Tuesday following, and on one of those days Capt. Prescott came into the office and said he understood he had signed a wrong paper. "I replied I was aware of that, and said to him, you had no occasion to sign the recommendatory letter. Col. Toone had nothing at all to do with it, having transferred it to you. He desired me to stop the papers as soon as they earne to the office, and not to pass the young man, or suffer him to be passed until Col, Toone had seen laim. On Wednesday I saw him again; he asked me if the young man had attended at the office to be passed. I told him he had not, the said, mind you let me have the papers; stop the papers as soon as they arrive, and do not suffer the young man to be passed till Col. Toone has seen him. On the Wednesday, when the young man was expected to present himself, Capt. Prescott sent out a message from the court-room to know if the papers had arrived."

Then Mr. Wynn and Mr. Astell were called, who gave their evidence of their utter ignorance of all these matters as you wight leave expected.

might have expected.

Then they further produce two other papers, marked C and D, which are very important, I think, for your attention; these are copies of another appointment in the month of February. In that month of February, Dr. Back was given to understand an appointment might have been had. The petition is signed by a person of the name of Dale, and then the director's nomination is signed by Mr. Prescott. " I, Charles Elton Prescott, (reading the nomination) " recommended to me by S. Sutton, Esq." Mr. Sutton signs the recommendatory letter. " Gentlemen, I bereby declare upon my honour, &c." (reading the recommendatory letter) that is signed by Samuel Sutton, and then Mr. Prescott signs what has been signed in the latter case, a declaration that he believes the answers to the questions to

Now that would have been the regular form to have been observed. On each the nominating director signs, and the person who recommended the party to the nominating director should sign the nomination. That course has not been pursued upon the present occasion; Colonel Toone signs the nomination, and signs, finally, his belief that the answers are true, and Mr. Prescott signs the recommendatory letter. Why that was done does not very distinctly appear, as certainly it is contrary to the usual practice in doing Whether he did not choose the thing. that Mr. Sutton's name should appear again as the party recommending to himself, he having so recently given him a nomination, does not appear; but he departs from that.

Now, in the address made to you by the learned counsel on behalf of Mr. Prescott, great reliance was placed upon that which Mr. Prescott did on the Tuesday and Wednesday, mamely, going to Mr. Abington; and desiring that the young gentleman might not pass till Colonel Toone had seen him; and it is exceedingly difficult to account for that, unless he had received the letter that Colonel Toone says he had written and sent by his servant. stating that he had himself written to Mr. Abington to say that the young man should not pass. If Mr. Prescott had received that letter it would have been natural : if he had not received it, I do not see why he should interfere.

I have already intimated to you, that in order to convict the parties of the latter charge, it is not necessary you should be satisfied, speaking of the case of Mr. Prescott, that he himself was to share; but you cannot convict him on the earlier part of the charge, unless you are satisfied he knew, and had reason to know, the appointment was to be made; and if all this evidence satisfies you, he must have known of the appointment that this person obtained from him in a very irregular way by means of Mr. Sutton and Mr. Andrews, for the papers passed If all this satisfies through their hands. you, he must have had a guilty knowledge that a profit was to be made, then he ought to be found guilty; if you are not satisfied of that, then he ought not to be convicted of the earlier and more important part of the charge. But then comes the other part, which is a fit subject for your consideration, and to that I am obliged to call your attention, and that is, that part which charges that all these defendants conspired to procure false representations to be made to the Court of Directors. That Edward Drake Back was a person with whose family connexions Mr. Prescott, at the time that false representation was made, was well acquainted for the purpose of obtaining this cadetship for him, whereas the defendants knew all the time the family connexions of Mr. Back were entirely unknown, that is quite a substantive distinct charge, and whatever your opinion may be as to the conspiracy or combination to obtain this presentation to himself or any of them, if you think they concurred in procuring this representation to be falsely made by Mr. Prescott to the Company as to his knowledge of the young man and his family and connexions, if you think that they all intended to do it falsely and corruptly, and not from a mere blunder or mistake, that is not the question; if they had all the same guilty purpose, whatever your verdict may be upon the other part of the case, Mr. Prescott bught to be found guilty upon this: but, unless you are satisfied of his guilt upon one or the other part of the charge, if doubt remains upon your minds you ought to place considerable weight upon the character given him. A great number of respectable gentlemen in the City of London have concurred in stating, that up to this time Mr. Prescott had borne an excellent character for honour and integrity-a kind-hearted and honourable man; they put it in different phrases, but that is the substance of it. A higher character could not have been given to any body, and if the evidence leaves doubt in your minds of his guilt, that character ought to turn the scale; but if the evidence leaves no doubt, then although he may have for so many years borne this high character, he may at last have fallen into error and guilt. If you are satisfied of his guilt you cannot do otherwise than say he is guilty; if you have any doubt you will acquit him. to the case of Despard, you will probably agree with me in thinking there can be no doubt.

The Jury consulted together for twenty minutes, and then pronounced

John Edward Despard guilty.

Charles Elton Prescott not guilty.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DECCAN PRIZE MONEY.

The distribution Prize money, arising from the booty captured in the Pindarry and Mahratta war, has commenced at the Deccan Prize office, 8, Regent Street.*

PROMOTIONS AND CHANGES IN THE BRITISH ARMY

(SERVING IN THE EAST.)

11th L. Dr. Corn. and Adj. W. Ready to be lieut. (28 June 27); S. Fisher to be corn., v. Kirke dec. (15 June); W. Franks to be corn. by purch., v. George prom. (28 June).

George prom. (28 June).

13th L.Dr. Lleut. Wm. Hake, from 16th L.D., to be capt., v. Grove dec. (7 May 27).

16th L.Dr. Corn. C. F. Havelock to be lieut., v. Hake prom. in 13th L. Drags. (7 May 27); E. J. Pratt to be corn., v. Havelock (14 Feb. 28).

1st Foot. Lieut. R. Burges, from h.p., to be lieut., v. A. J. Pictet., who exch., rec. dif. (21 Feb. 28); Ens. J. Wulker, from New! Vet. Comps., to be ens., v. Chomps. to be ens., v. Chomps. to be ens., v. Chomps. to be ens., v. Capt. (1 Mar.)

3d Foot. Lieut. T. H. Owen to be capt., v. Mac. kay, whose prom. has not taken place; Ens. L. Desborough to be lieut., v. Owen; W. Roche to be ens., v. Desborough (all 14 Nov. 27).

20th Foot. Lieut. E. Cates, from 77th F., to be lieut., v. Herbert, who exch. (14 Feb. 28).

neut., v. Herbert, who exch. (14 Feb. 29).
30th Foot. Capt. C. H. Roberts, from 4eth F., to be capt., v. Lynch prom. (26 Feb. 28); Ens.
W. B. Staff to be lieut., v. Thompson dec. (10 Mar. 27); Ens. T. R. Burrowes to be lieut., v.
Backhouse dec. (16 May); Ens. J. G. Wright to be lieut., v. Tobin dec. (26 May); Wn. Marlton to be ens., v. Staff (10 May); W. A. Steele to be ens., v. Burrowes (16 May); O. G. Perrott to ens., v. Wright (26 May).

39th Foot. Ens. G. Greene to be lieut., v. Min-chin dec. (29 June 27); W. G. Edwards to be ens., v. Greene (14 Feb. 28); Qu. Mast. Serj. — Good-fellow, from 14th F., to be qu. mast, v. Good dec. (21 Feb. 28).

39th Foot. Maj. Thos. Poole, from 22d F., to be maj., v. Crofton, who exch. (21 Feb. 28).

41st Foot. Qu. Mast. Serj. J. Davidson, from 3d F. Gu., to be qu. mast., v. Randle dec. (14 Feb. 28); Euc. W. B. Sparrow superseded, having ab-sented himself without leave when under orders for embarkation for East-Indies (25 Mar.)

 We have no room this month for the details contained in the London Gazettes of February 29 and March 11: they shall appear in our next mimber.

45th Foot. Lieut. F. Ebhart to be capt., v. Hamilton dec.; Ens. E. T. Coke to be lieut., v. Ebhart (both 3 Jan. 27.); Wm. Graham to be ens., v. Elliott prom. (31 Jan. 28).

47th Foot. Brev. Maj. T. Backhouse to be maj., v. Ramsey dec. (29 June 72); Capt. T. Daly, from h. p., to be capt., v. Backhouse (14 Feb. 28).

49th Foot. Capt. J. J. Moss, from h p. 13th L. Tr, to be capt., v. Roberts, app. to 30th F. (26 Feb. 29).

54th Foot. Lieut. P. Warren to be capt. by purch., v. Woodgate, who res.; Ens. J. R. Turner to be lieut. by purch., v. Warren; R. Parr to be ens. by purch., v. Turner (all 26 Feb. 201.)

97th Foot. Ens. A. F. Morgan, from h. p., to be ens., v. Chetham, whose app. has not taken place (6 Mar. 28).

Ceylon Regt. Capt. R. Armstrong, from h. p., to be capt., v. Penny app. to 94th F. (21 Feb. 20). Stiff. Brev. Licut. Col. W. H. Sewell, on h. p. 60th F., to be dep. qu. mast. gen. to King's troops serving in East-Indles. v. Read dec. (14 Feb. 28.)

Brevet. Col. Chas. Dallas, governor of St. Helena, to have rank of brigadier general on that island only (14 Feb. 28).

The undermentioned cadets of the Hon. E. I. Company's service to have temporary rank as ensigns during period of their being placed under command of Lieut. Col. Pasley, at Chatham, for field instructions in art of sapping and mining.

Cadets M. A. Birdwood, A. S. Waugh, J. C. Shaw, T. S. Kennedy, R. Martin, B. W. Goldle, H. Watts, J. P. Power, F. E. B. Bennett, and E. L. Ommany (all 14 Feb. 28).

Royal East-India Volunteers, Lieut, W. Baker to be capt., v. Young dec., Ens. T. Hemah to be lieut., v. Baker; and Jas. Dav.s to be ensign, v. Hennah (all 1 Mar. 20).

INDIA SHIPPING.

A. rivals.

Feb. 27. Marwer, Neworthy, from Baravia 20th Oct.; and Jihn Barry, Roche, from Batavia 20th Opt.; and Jihn Barry, Roche, from Batavia ath April, and Mauritus all Dec.; both at Cowes—28. Integrit Pooket, Steeman, from Singapore 9th Sept., and Penang 1st Oct.; and Ethn. Pattison, from Cape of Good Hope 15th Dec.; both at Gravesend,—also, Rev Intro. Perker, from Mauritus 20th Nov.; and Language Considers Com-Sept., and Demaig 1st Oct.; and Ellion Pattitson, from Cape of Good Hope 13th Dec; both at Gravesend.—also, Revintion, Perker, from Mauritius 20th Nov.; and Depuncies, Grasslaw, from Mauritius 10th Nov.; both at Deal.—March 2. Alboon, Ralph, from Singapore 3th Oct., Batavia 31st Oct., and Mauritius 28th Nov.; at Deal.—also, Waltoroth Castle, Sincialit, from Br. van; at Gravesend.—B. Et a. Thompson, from Bengal 38th Oct.; bind Br. van; at Gravesend.—B. Et a. Liverpool.—9. Surean, Hamilton, from Bengal 28th May, Madres 21st Sept. and Mauritius 28th Nov.; and Inaulton, from Graveson, Hamilton, from Graveson, Hamilton, from China 28th Oct.; both at Deal.—12. Labbila, Clarkson, from Mauritius, 8.: of Perance.—13. Cinico, Pinder, from Bengal. Penang, Singapore, and Batavia; at Liverpool.—also, Matida. Bulley, from Singapore 21st Nov.; off Dartmouth.—14. Dublim, Stewart, from Bombay 23d Sept.; at Gravesend.—15. Reviewal, God. Bridgeworter, Manderson, from China 19th Nov.; at Gravesend.—16. Bridgeworter, from Bengal 22d Nov.; off Portsmouth, —also, Mary, Becacheroft, from Bombay 23d Nov.; off Portsmouth, —also, Mary, Grow Bengal 22d Nov.; both off Weymonth.—17. Horefordshire, Whiteman, from China 19th Nov.; and Competitor, Jackson, from Bombay 24th Oct., and Ceylon 4th Oct. both at Gravesend.—18. Barossa, Hutchinson, from Mauritius 6th Dec, and Cape of Hore, Lock, from Bengal 22d Nov.; and Cape of Hore, College, Gribble, from Lengal 24th Sept., and Mauritius from Nov.; at Gravesend.—22. Rolley White of Morth, From Mauritius 6th Dec, and Cape of Hore, and Cape of Hore, Lock, from Bengal 28th Sept., and Mauritius from Nov.; at Gravesend.—18. Reviews. Henderson, from Mauritius 6th Dec, and Cape of Hore, and Hore, an Antwerp).—also, Lowther Caetle, Baker, from China 19th Nov.; off Dartmouth.

Dendrtures.

Departures.

Feb. 27. Earl of Balcarras, Broughton, for Bengal and China; Brd Marquis Conden, Larking, for St. Helena, Bombay, and China; both from St. Helena, Bombay, and China; both from St. Helena, Bombay, and China; both from Portsmouth.—29. Tanmes, Bugg, for Madras and Bengal; Holden, Fowler, for Bengal; and Hebe, Rickinnond, for the Cape of Good Hope; all from Deal.—30. Welcome, Paul, for Bengal; from Greenock.—March 2. Providence, Ford, for Madras and Bengal; from Portsmouth.—5. William Fairlie, Blair, for Madras and China; from Deal.—7. Virtory, Farquharson, for Cape, Madras, and Bengal; and Phomas, Cuzons, for N. S. Wales (with Convicts); both from Portsmouth,—also, Mary, Giuv, for Bombay; from Deal.—11. Macqueen, Walker, for Madras and China; from Portsmouth,—also, Columbia, Wilson, for V. D. Land and N.S. Wales; from Greenock.—12. Lind Louther, Stewart, for Madras and China; from Portsmouth,—also, And, Ferrier, from Liverpool.—14. Socreege, Nesfield, for Bombay; from Liverpool.—15. Eegulina, Lillburn, for Bombay; Clumbia, Carew, for Batavia, Singapore, and Penang; and Coronet, Dan el, for N. S. Wales; all from Deal.—16. Budamum, Pearce, for Bengal; from Liverpool.—32. Crujecouer, Hay, for Marlinus, Ceylon, and Bengal; Magroma, Redknap, for Madras and Hengal Willam Perker, Brown, for Cape of Good Hope; from Liverpool.—18. Timma Card (with Chivestel) and Brads, Fraser, for N. S. Wales; and Hidman Marke, Sampson, Can Lead, Sangapore, and Hidman Marke, Sampson, Can Lead, Carlow, Forder, John Horn Deal.—28. English China; from Physiological China; and Carlow, Forder, Dischard, Dukkin, for Marthy, Sangapore, and Hidman Marke, Sangapore, and Hidman Marke, Sangapore, from Liverpool.—32. Crujecouer, Hay, for Marthy, Sangapore, Sangapore, and Hidman Marke, Sangapore, Sangapore, and Hidman Marke, Sangapore, Sangapore

PASSENGERS FROM INDIA.

Per Lord Hungerford, from China. Mr. R. Ed-

Per Rothurgh Castle, from Bengal: Mrs. Sheddon; Mrs. Reynolds; Mis. Creghton; Mrs. Rivnet; Mrs. Bishop: Major T. C. Watson; P. R. Sheddon, Esq., Captaire Hoctor, Wilson, Mason, and Douglas; Leudis Prantise, Orr, Bartlem on, and Blake; Misses Sheddon, Reynolds, and two Creghton; Masters Douglas and Serwinght.

ton; ansacts roughs and servingit.

Per Heigendstee, from Bengal and China
the Rev. C. Caven, of Bishop's College, Calust; Mrs. Craven; Master Craven; Mrs. Hewit;
Master Liewit; Capt. R. Delamaln; Mr. Markintesh; Master C. Jackson; Lieut. Ashton, from St. Helena; three children.

Per Repulse, from Bengal and China: J. B. Harington, Isaq., late Member of Council, Calcutta: Mrs. Harington: two Misses Harington; two Misses Plowden; Mrs. Col. Nixon.

Per Duke of York, from Penang and China Dr. Anderson, Penang establishment; four Chi-nese students for Naples.

Per George, from Bengal: Mr. and Mrs. Thorpe; Miss Watson; Capt. Baldwin, H.M.'s 31st Foot; Licut. M'Clintock, Bengal cavalry; Mr. Mackin-non, surgeon; Mr. R. Harvic.

Per Competitor, from Bombay: — Legget, Esq. and three children; Miss Leggett; Lleut. Storle; Mrs. Storle; Lleut. MacIntyre; Dr. Wood.

Per Rolla, from New South Wales; Mr. Pearks; Mr. Noble; Capt. Cunningham, late of the ship Hope.

Per Andromeda, for N.S. Wales: Capt. R. Dacre. Per Isabella, from Bengal (arrived last month); Ens. M'Mahon, H.C.'s service; Dr. Molyneaux, Per Crown, from Bengal, &c., Lieut. Preston, R.N.

Per Mary, from Bombay: Mrs. Tharpier; Mrs. Stuart; Ens. Stuart, H. M.'s 6th regt.; Mr. Phlipps; Mr. O'Connor; Dr. Power; Mr. Hornby.

Per Louther Custle, from China, &c.: Lieut. E ns. B synton, H.M.'s 89th Poot; 200 soldiers Kert, from Bengal; Mrs. Kerr; Miss Hough; Dr. H.M.'s 41st, 54th, and 89th regts of Foot; 32-Marden, from Hombay.

PASSENGERS TO INDIA.

PASSENGERS TO INDIA.

Per Abercrombie Robinson, for Bombay; Mrs. M. Fenwick: Misses Margaret Home and Sarah Home; Mr. H. T. Chatterton, assist, surg.; Lionin Liddell, writer; Mr. Alex, Henderson; Mr. Jas. Fatribo Crauling; Mrs. Henderson; Mr. Jas. Fatribo reside; Messes, J. C. Hartley, A. W. W. Ling, W. G. Wheatley, K. Jopp, A. Prezcott, W. Kirkpatrick, W. S. Hodgson, H. E. D. Jones, and G. Wardle, cadets; Messrs. C. T. Warden and T. W. Fletcher, volunteers Bombay marine; Messrs. S. H. Buckler, Alfred Offer, J. Bird. W. J. Garrett, and R. Waller, pilot service; Mr. H. Mulet, free marine; Mr. J. Barron; 20 Company's recruits; several servants.

recruits; several servants.

Por Eul of Bulavarna, for Bengal; Colonel Cameron, Lieut: Walker, and Lieut. Golden, H.M.'s 34 Foot; Mrs. Cameron, wife of Col. Cameron; Silis M. Cameron; daughter of ditto; two sons of Col. Cameron; Mrs. E. B. Worrall; Misses E. Grey and M. Spottiswood, returning; Messr. M. Mortock, H. H. Cornish, F. W. Cornish, A. Huist, J. Bell, R. Hill, J. Jones, J. C. Dias, J. Hunter, J. Knox, A. Broome, and A. Seppling, calets; Messrs. G. J. Berwick and A. Walker, ssist, surgs.; Messrs. J. Morse and G. Byworth, free marniner; 78 privates H.M.'s 34 Foot; 9 solders' wives 7 children of ditto; several European and native cvants. and native servants.

and native servants.

Posterose the Fourth, for Bengal; Capt. Cormac. Licut. Chatterton, and Ens. Johnstone.
Lim. 33 Hoot; Capt. Fothergill, 13th L.Inf.;
Mrs. Fothergill; Mis. Chatterton; Miss G. M.
Smath: Lisut. H. Moffat, H.C.'s service, returning; Mes-rs. N. B. Edmonstone, J. Thornton, and
J. Murr, writers; Messis. A. Q. Hopper, O. Vincent, D. H. Whistler, T. J. Harriett, H. M. Barwith, and H. Hunchman, cadets; five orphan childrea belonging to the Military Asylum, Bengal;
Mis. Mulicran, muse to differ; So dollers; Miss. States

Miss. Mulicran, muse to differ; So dollers; Miss. States

All and 18th regis. of Foot; 9 soldlers' wives; 10 children of drift of; 2 Company's recruits in charge of horses; several native servants.

of horses; several native servants.

Per Manquas Canadon, for Bombay, &c.: Brig.
Gen. Chas. Dallas, new governor of St. Helena;
Mrs. Dallas, wife of dutto; Misses B. J. Dallas, D.
E. Dallas, and C. A. Dallas, daughters of dutto;
Mr. J. B. Alexander, cadact, for St. Helena; Messis R. Hodson and T. Munster, cadets, for Bombay; Mr. J. F. Jornes and H. Hewerk, volunteers for Bombay marine, several charter-party passengers; do Company's revenity; 5 soldiers' wices; 5 children of ditto; Furopean servants, &c.

wives 3 children of ditto f Puropean seri ants, &c. Per Loot Location, for Madrias and Bengal: Licut. Col. Coombs, Il. C. & service, returning: Capl. T. Br. C. Mantell, Mitto ditto: T. Ibuddiamu, ditto ditto: Messrs. D. Johnson, Edw. King, W. F. Wooks, G. M. Giumm, and F. Ditmas, cadets, Miss E. Mason, proceeding to her husband; Miss Jane Moore; Major Brutton, Licut. M'Mahon, Licut. Wetherell, Cornet Hime and Comet. Jones, H. M. S. 13th. I. Dings: 1 Ens. Clendhuning, H.M.'s 13th Foot; Capt. Otway, Ens. Campbell, and Ens. Gasseim, H.M.'s 46th Foot; Capt. Bell and Fruct. McCamband, H.M.'s 89th Foot; 26a Bollers H.M.'s 13th L. Ding, and 45 h, 46th, and 49th regists of Foot; 30d soldiers H.M.'s 13th L. Ding of the different of ditto.

H.M.'s 4ist, 54th, and 89th regts of Foot; 39 soldiers wives; 35 children of ditto.

Per William Fairlie, for Madras: Colonel Fraser, H.C.'s service, returning to duty; Mrs. Fraser, wife of ditto; Misses Fraser and Mackenzie; Mr. W. Douglas, writer, returning; Mrs. Douglas, wife, of ditto; Misses G. Bird, A. Stirling, Mr. Livermore, and M. Seymour; Lieut. A. Mackenzie, H.C.'s service, returning; Mrs. H. Mackenzie, H.G.'s service, returning; Mrs. H. Mackenzie, of the of ditto; Mrs. Lushington; proceeding to her husband; Mrs. Sholebread; Mrs. M. Green; Mr. Geo. Gordon, free merthant; Messrs. A. T. Dickson, and J. B. Fraser, writers; Messrs. T. Morrell, H. Congreve, D. Groube, C. Ireland, H. Ferrier, P. Holmes, J. Moore, B. W. Black, D. W. Balfour, L. M. Queen, and T. C. Hawkins, cadeta; Mr. B. Moseley, cadet for Bengal; Møjor Farquharson, Adj. Richardson, Lieut. Johnstone, Lieut. M. Pherson, Ens. Webster, Ens. Furnell, and Ens. Cathrow, H.M.'s sit or royal Regt.: Capt. Armstrong and Qu. Mast. Sholebread, H.M.'s 40th Foot; Capt. Duck, H.M.'s 18th Foot; Lieut. Graham and Lieut. Bis 154 Sth. 18th, and 8th regts of Foot; 31 soldlers' wives; 24 children of ditto; several European servants.

Per Thomac Coutts, for Bengal (corrected list):

ditto; several European servants.

Per Thomas Coutts, for Bengal (corrected list): Mrs. MacKenzle; Mrs. Goodwin and infant child; Misses C. Ochterlony, Emma Bishop, Penelope Bishop, and Ellen Goodwin; Col. Sir Jeremiah Dixon, Capt. F. MacKenzle, Lieut. G. C. Ponsonby, and J. Swiney, Esq., M.D., returning to their duty; Mr. D. J. Thorburn, assist surg.; Messus. Wm. Richardson, J. C. Dougan, H. M. Nation, A. Gilander, W. R. Barnes, F. Bevan, Win. Rogers, and G. Pengree, cadets; Messrs, W. D. M'Clintock and Wm. Dogherty, volunteers Bengal pilot service; Mr. F. Mick, Lleut. Barker, Ens. Wade, Ens. Edwards, Ens. Darlot, Ens. Vijcors, and Ens. Merkle, H. Mi. Slath Foot; Lieut. Higginbotham, Lieut. Watson, Ens. Wilder, and Ens. Campbell, H.M. Slath Foot; Capt. Matthews, and Lleut. Irwin, II.M.'s 38th Foot; Capt. Matthews, and Lleut. Irwin, II.M.'s 38th Foot; Capt. Oxford, Lieut. Mackrill, and Ens. Lewis, II.M.'s 44th Foot.

II.M.'s 44th Foot.

Per Coatle Hundly, for Manritius, Penang, and Singapore: Lieut. Gen. the Hon. Sir Chas. Colville, new Govennor of the Mauritius; Lady Colville, the Movennor of the Mauritius; Lady Colville, Mr. Wm. Colville; Misses A. A. Colville, and C. D. Coville; Misse S. S. Baigrier, Maj. M. Fraser; A. Frankland, Esq.; Mr. A. Johnson; Capit. C. H. Hay; Lieut. Col. Wm. Baifour; Capit. D. Barclay; D. T. Napier, Esq.; Mrs. Rarry; Mr. A. G. Barry; C. A. Mylms, Esq.; Mrs. Mylms, Mr. Davids, antibiliprian, to join the Lord Lovether; Dr. Dart, for the Mauritius.

Per Victum, for Madras and Benegal; Mrs. Rary.

oner; Dr. Dart, for the Mauritany, Per Victory, for Madras and Bengal; Mrs. Farquharson; Mrs. Hawkins; Mrs. F. Russell; Miss Marland; Mis. Harrington; Mr. Golvin, Mr. and Mrs. Savory; Messrs. Welstead, Latouch, Porter, Colvin, French, Hallet, Lewis, Baker, Collisson, Dox Cyauchan, Rogers, Glasco &, Cooper, Hampton, Pockington, Ferris, and Walker.

Per Lady Regites, for Bombay: Capt. Grey and lady; Licut. M'Kenzie: Mrs. Denham; Messrs, Mau c, Berthon, Cubingham, Tan, Jackson, F. Jackson, M. Haffle, M'Cutchean, Hall, Wyllie, Renney, Brown, Orrok., Cubil, Walters, Travers, Renncy, Br and Jeffrey.

Per Egyptian, for Bombay: Capt. Fernandez.

BIRTHS, MARRINGES, AND DEATHS

March 5. At Hull Place, Kent, the lady of Col. M'Creagh, 13th Foot, of a son.
7. At Eltham, the lady of Capt. Abdy, Madras artillery, of a son-

MARRIAGES.

F.b. 23. At St. Botolph, Aldgate, J. A. Deans, Esq., of Bemlipatam, East-Indius, to Elizabeth, second daughter of the late F. A. Hellmer, Esq., of Jewry Street, Landon. 28. At 101m, North Britain, Major A. Fraser, of Culduthel, to Louisa, daughter of the late Column, Burten, of the Hon. E.l. Company's section.

98. At Brighton, Wm. B. Anderson, Esq., Madras ctvll service, to Elisabeth Lucy, second daughter of R. H. Crew, Esq., of Bath.

At St. Marylebone Church, Capt. A. P. Hamilton, of the Royal Navy, to Caroline, only child of the late Lleut. Col. Cook, of the Hon. E. I. Campany's service, and of Chingford, Essex.

March 11. At St. Savlours, Southwark, the Rev. John Smith, missionary to India, to Sarah, eldost daughter of the late Mr. E. Marden, of the former piace.

15. At Kennington, Capt. R. Marr, of the Hon.

E.I. Company's military service, to Emily, eldest daughter of G. F. Joseph. Esq. A.R.A.

— At Bedford, Lieut. G. W. Malim, 13th L.

Inf. to Louisa, daughter of S. Sharman, Esq., of Redford Bedford.

Bedford.

18. At Stirling, Capt. Geo. Barker, of the Bengal army, to Eliza, eldest daughter of D. Doble, Esq., of Gartferry, Lanarkshire.

20. H. R. Elliott, Esq., of the Bombay establishment, to Mary, daughter of T. Simpson, Esq., consul of H.M. the King of the Nctherlands at Stockton.

at Stockton.

25. At St. George's, Hanover Square, John Harwood, Esq., of the Madras army, to Olivia Halliday, second daughter of John Crooke, Esq., and grand-daughter of J. C. Crooke, Esq., of Kempshot Park, Hants.

— At St. Pancras New Church, Capt. Campbell, of the Madras cavairy, eldest son of Robt.
Campbell, Esq., Director of the Hou. East-India Company, to Grace Elizabeth, second daughter of Thos. Bainbridge, Esq., of Queen Square, and of Crovdon. Surrey. Croydon, Surrey.

DEATHS.

DEATHS.

Reb. 11. At Elgin, North Britain, Major Robert Duff, late of the Hon. E. I. Company's service.

— At Rome. Maj. Gen. Lord Frederick Brinck, youngest brother of the Duke of Portland, and colonel of the 38th Foot.

23. In Maddox Street, Magdalenc, the lady of Sir Charles Malcolm, R.N., aged 42.

25. At Brighton, Mrs. Carnegle, wife of Jas. Carnegle, E4q., formerly captain of the Baring East-Indiaman.

Hodaman.

— At Easterland House, near Weilington, Somersetshire, Maria Bellett, wife of Col. Marmaduke Browne, of the Bengal artillery.

27. The Rev. Dr. J. F. Wilkinson, of Upper Seymour Street, and formerly of St. Helena, aged

28. At Chiswick, Jane, Countess of Macartney, widow of George, Earl of Macartney, in her 86th Maj. Gen. Ogg, late of the Hon. E. I. Company's service.

— At Sherborne Villa, Spa, Gloucester, Augusta

Sophia, wife of Capt. C. H. Raymond, of the Bengal establishment.

March 5. At North Church, Herts, F. Moore, Eaq., formerly Major of H.M.'s 11th Light Drags., in his 77th year.

9. At Fulham, Lieut. Gen. Sir Alan Cameron, K.C.B., colonel of the 79th or Cameron Highlan.

den.

17. John James, third son of Lleut. Col. Geo.
17. John James, third son of Lleut. Col. Geo.
17. John James, third son of Lleut. Col. Geo.
17. John James, Bengal artillery.
18. Ann, daughter of Mr. T. D. Grissell, of Charter Hous Square, in her 17th year.

Lately. At Irvine, Ayrshire, Henry James, son of Capt. J. Graham, commanding Bhauglegoor Hill Hangers, in his 15th year.

— On board the H.C.'s ship Herefordshire, off Madagascar, on the passage to England, Mr. R.
Boyes, surgoon of that vessel.

— On board the ship George, on the passage from Bengal to England, Philip Francis, Faq., of the civil service,—also, Lleut. Douglas, of H.M.'s 31st regt.

the civil service,—and, Lieut. Douglas, on H.M.; 3

1st regt.
— On board the ship Competitor, on the passage from Bombay to England, Mrs. Leggett, wife of — Leggett, Esq. — On board the ship Rosburgh Castle, on the passage to England, Lieut. G. T. Bishop, of the 9th Bengal L.C.,—also, Lieut. Dalrymple, of the Bengal army.

GOODS DECLARED FOR SALE AT THE EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

For Sale 15 April-Prompt 11 July. Company's and Licensed .- Indigo.

For Sale 29 April-Prompt 15 July.

Rummage of certain Goods, &c. which have remained in the Company's Warchouses longer than allowed by law. CARGOES of EAST-INDIA COM-

PANY'S SHIPS lately arrived. CARGOES of the Lord Hungerford, Hereford-shire, Bridgeneater, Repulse, Duke of York, Bu-rosed, and Lonther Castle, from China; and the Susan and Roaburgh Castle, from Bengal.

Company's .- Tea-Sugar-Indigo. Company's.—Tea—Sugat—Indigo.
Private-Trade and Pruvlege.—Tea—Raw Silk—Wrought Silks — Nankeens — Ikhubarh— Vermililion—Gamboge—Indian Ink—Rice Composition—Rice Paper—White Paper—Fans—Lacquered
Ware—China Ware—Mother-o-Pearl—Tortokeshell—Seed Coral — Mats — Table Mats—Whanghees—Bamboo Canes—Madeira Wine—Sherry.

INDIAN SECURITIES AND EXCHANGES.

Calcutta, Nov. 15, 1827.

Calcutta, Nov. 15, 1827.
Government Securities.
Buy.] Rs. As.
Prem. 36 0 Remittable Loan 6 per ct. 25 0 Prem.
Disc. 0 2 Five per ct. Loan. . . . . 0 6 Disc.
Prem. 0 2 New 5 per cent. Loan. . . . 0 2 Disc.
Rates of Exchange.
On London, 6 months' sight,—to buy 1s. 104. to 1s. 114.—to sell 1s. 14t. to 2s. per Sicra Rupee.
On Madras, 30 days' ditto, 92 to 34 Sicca Rupees.
On Bombay. ditto, 33 to 30 Sicca Rupees per 100 Madras Rupees.
On Bombay Rupees.
Bank Shares.—Prem.—to buy $,150—to sell 5,100.

Madras, Oct 10, 1827.

.... 284 Prem.

Moders in buying and selling Pub.

lic Securities, viz. 106 Madras Rs. per Bombay, Oct. 24, 1827.

On London, at 6 months' sight, 1s. 6jd. per Rupee. On Calcutta, at 30 days' sight, 106 Bom. Rs. per 100 Sicca Rupees. On Madras, at 30 days' sight, 99 Bom. Rs. per 100 Madras Rs.

Singapore, Nov. 3, 1827.

Exchange.

Gov. Bills on Bengal, at 30 days' sight, per 100 Sp. Ds., 207 Sic. Rs. Private Bills on ditto—none. Private Bills on London, per Sp. Ds. 4s. 2d.

Canton, Nov. 15.

Company's bills on Bengal, at 30 days sight, 200 Sa.Rs. to 100 Sp.Drs.
Private ditto, at ditto, 200 to 202 to ditto.
Company's bills on London, none.
Private ditto, at 6 months sight, 4s. to 4s. 2d. per Sp. Dr.

Sp. Dr.
Private bills on Bombay, none.
Sycee silver 51 per cent. prem.

DEBATE AT THE EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

East-India House, March 19, 1828.

A quarterly general Court of Proprie-tors of East-India Stock was this day held at the Company's House in Leadenhall Street.

ACCOUNT OF THE COMPANY'S STOCK.

The minutes of the last Court having been read.

The Chairman (the Hon. H. Lindsay) said. "I have to acquaint the Court that the account of the stock, per computation, of the Company, with respect to India to the 1st of May 1826, and with respect to England to the 1st of May, 1827, which could not be laid before the Court, according to the By-law, in December last, on account of the delay attending the receipt of the necessary documents from Bengal, is now laid before the Proprietors.

PENSIONS, SUPERANNUATIONS, &c.

The Chairman .- "I have to acquaint the Court, that certain papers which have been presented to Parliament since the last General Court are now laid before the Proprietors, in conformity with cap. 1, sec. 4, of the By-laws.

The papers were regulations framed by the Bengal Government in 1825 and 1826, and resolutions of the Court of Directors, being warrants for pensions or gratuities.

The Chairman then laid before the Proprietors, an account of superan-nuations of the East India Company's officers and servants in England, and an account of superannuations of servants of the Board of Control, under the act of the 53d Geo. 3d, cap. 155, sec. 9I

GRANT TO CAPTAIN T. BUCHANAN.

The Chairman,-"I have now to acquaint the Court, that it has been made special for the purpose of submitting for confirmation, the resolution of the General Court of the 19th of December last, approving a resolution of the Court of Directors of the 5th of the same month, granting to Captain Thomas Buchanan, the present superintendant of the Bombay marine, a pension of £800 per annum, on the grounds therein stated.

The clerk then read the resolution of the General Court of the 19th of December.

Mr. Poynder .- " I know, Sir, it is not exactly regular to ask a question in this stage of the business-but my inquiry is of so plain and simple a nature, that I hope you will allow me to make it."

Asiat. Journ. Vol. 25. No.148.

The Chairman .- "Has the question any reference to the present motion?'

Mr. Poynder,-" It has no reference to that subject."

The Chairman intimated that it would be irregular to ask the question, and proceeded to move-" that the Court confirm the resolution of the General Court of the 19th of December last, approving of the resolution of the Court of Directors of the 5th of that month, granting to Captain T. Buchanan a pension of £800 per annum."

The Deputy Chairman, (J. Pattison, Esq.) seconded the motion.

General Thornton said, it became his duty again to protest against this grant; and he was extremely sorry that the amendment moved at the last General Court had not been carried. amendment having been so strongly en-forced and supported, he (Gen. T.) had flattered himself that the Court of Directors would have changed their opinion. and devised some other way of providing for Capt. Buchanan. In ordinary cases a fortnight or three weeks only was suffered to elapse, before a Court was summoned to confirm grants of this nature, but here three months had passed before the confirmation was called for, and therefore he had hoped that the directors had adopted some other means of providing for this gentleman. It appeared to him, that the grant was most excessive. .Capt. Buchanan was in the prime of life, perfectly capable of performing the duties of office, and therefore there was no reason for thus pensioning him off. He was glad to see, on the former occasion, a part of the Court of Directors voting in favour of the amendment; and he meant this day to move another amendment, which he trusted would meet with the approval of the gentlemen behind the bar, as well as of the proprietors generally. It was most extraordinary to him, that a man in the prime of life, and who was fit to fill an active situation, could not have some other office found for him, in which his services would be useful to the Company, instead of being converted into a dead weight on their funds. As there was much other business before the Court. he should take up no more of their time, but move, as an amendment, that after the words "£800 per annum," these words shall be inserted, -until a suitable . employment shall be provided for him." To this amendment he could see no objection whatever; the reasonableness of the proposition would, he hoped, cause it to be acceded to at once.

Mr. Gahagan rose to express his entire dissent from the present motion. He really could not see on what principle of reason it was offered to the Court. Had this pension been given to Capt. Buchanan on account of great and signal services, he could understand it. Had it been given for a long career of service, in the course of which he had been visited by some of the calamities of heaven, or rendered unfit for business by some moral incapacity, this too he could understand. Or if it were given him on the ground that he was certain of enjoying the situation he filled, in the ordinary course of life, for many years, but that he was driven from it by unforeseen circumstances, this also he could understand. If Capt. Buchanan had been suddenly, and by extraordinary circumstances interrupted in his official duties, he could understand why he should be provided for; but he confessed, as the case now stood, he did not understand it. He was not incapacitated by age; he was not incapacitated by sickness; and he had not served that length of time which would justify the Court in remunerating his services with so large a reward. There was nothing in his services of that signal and splendid character which could challenge such a mark of respect; but the Court of Directors turned out one competent man, and put in another competent man, merely because the officers of the Bombay marine had obtained Be it so, let rank in the naval service the change be made; but was it fair that two competent men should receive pay at the same time; one, because he had filled the office, but was now unemployed; the other because he at present filled the office, and would probably hold it all his life? There was no surprise, no precipitancy in the new arrangement. The Hon. Chairman himself had declared in the face of that Court, that a negociation had been long going on, for the purpose of transferring the superintendance of the Bombay marine to an officer of His Majesty's navy. Therefore Capt. Buchanan must have known the fact; or, if he did not, the proper authorities should have informed him, that he was liable to be removed from the office of superintendant. He had, it appeared, served in the situation of superintendant for 18 months, or two years at the utmost, and then it was proposed to grant him a pension of £800 a year. Did those who framed this plan say to Capt Bucannan, " it we can find another suitable employment for you, this pension shall merge in the conduments of that employment?" No such thing. And yet another office could have been found for Capt. Buchanan, - that of the master intendant at Madras. That situation but he should like to know why it had not been given to Capt. Buchanan? A very distinguished and able man, Sir John Malcolm, now Governor of Bombay, had some time since come to that Court, or at least his friends had come for him, and demanded a pension because he had ceased to have employment; and. in consequence of his signal services, he that occasion, one Hon. Director had said, "If Sir J. Maleolm had got the situation which we wanted to give him. he would not have been here this day, asking for a pension." Now, if he heard that Sir J. Malcolm, or any other pensioned governor, gave up his pension when he was placed in an office, he should be satisfied. Under such circumstances, Sir J. Malcolm, or any other person so situated, did no more than his duty in throwing up his pension. But he would not leave the matter to the will of the individual. He thought that pensions of this description should be declared to be floating pensions, which should merge in the salary of any office bestowed on the party pensioned. It should be understood hereafter, when a pension was given to any person capable of performing duty, and who afterwards accepted of a situation under the Company, that then the pension should merge in the He wished to know, and he hoped the answer would be in the affirmative, whether the distinguished officer to whom he had alluded, and who stood so high in the Company's estimation, had, on his appointment to office, abandoned his pension? He asked this, because an Hon. Director had said, that Sir J. Malcolm would not have required a pension if they could have given him a situation.

The Chairman .- " The hon. gentleman has called on me to account for this recommendation. I did so at a former general court, and I feel great pleasure in reiterating my explanation at this. pension now under consideration was awarded to Captain Buchanan on the ground that he had been superseded in a situation which, though he had not held it long, he looked forward to have held for many years. That gentleman had been at Bombay for some years in a subordinate capacity, and when Mr. Mcriton gave up the situation of superintendant, it was bestowed upon him. He was now removed from that office in consequence of the appointment of a gentleman in his Majesty's naval service. I do not think," continued the hon, gentleman," that, looking at these circumstances, the Court of Proprietors can wish, because an officer has been removed without any fault whatever imputed to him, but removed merely because he has not that rank which it is considered necessary for the superintendant to possess since the Lord High Admiral has granted naval rank to the Bombay Marine. I say, I do not think, such being the case, that the Court of Proprietors would wish to refuse a fair remuneration to Captain Buchanan. It has been deemed expedient, since the alteration has been made, that an officer of naval rank should preside over the Bombay marine, and therefore Captain Buchanan has been superseded. On that account, as I have already said, he is entitled to compensation. Captain Buchanan had a reasonable right, when he was placed in the situation, to expect that he would hold it for a long time, if his life were spared. The Court of Directors considered the value of the appointment, and proposed a certain renuneration; acting under these views, we now call upon the general court to confirm the grant. With respect to the amendment, I should have no objection to it, if it were couched in other words. If it were specified that Captain Buchanan should hold this pension " while unemployed," I would agree to it; but to say that he shall retain the pension till he is provided with a suitable employment, would in some degree, by implication, pledge the court to provide for him, and I cannot consent to pledge either the present or any future Court of Directors to that point. This is, I think, a case calling for remuneration, because Captain Buchanan has been removed without the slightest imputation on his character; and if the gallant officer will substitute for his amendment, " so long as Captain Buchanan shall be out of employment," I shall be perfectly satisfied."

Sit F. Ommaney said, in deciding this question it was very material for the court to know how long Capt. Buchanan had served at Bombay—what was his age, and what was the salary attached to his situation.

The Chairman.—" I hardly feel myself competent to answer the question off-hand; but I think, to the best of my recollection, that the salary of superintendent is £3,300 a year. I believe I formerly stated that Captain Buchaman had filled a subordinate situation at Bombay for seven or eight years before he was appointed superintendent, which office he has held tor a year and a-half, or two years. If the gallant officer is satisfied with the words I have proposed, instead of his amendment, I shall willingly add them to the original motion."

General Thornton. "After what the hon Chairman has said, I shall, with the leave of the court, and with the understanding that the words which he has mentioned shall be added to the motion, withdraw my amendment."

Mr. Gahugan. "I wish to have an answer to my question, whether Sir John Malcolm does or does not at present retain his pension?"

The Chairman.—" Sir John Malcolm has not given it up."

Mr. Gahagan. "Then my humble opinion is, that he ought to give it up."

Col. I. Stanhope, "I wish to make one observation as to what my hon friend says relative to Sir J. Malcolm. I disagree with him entirely on that point, because Sir J. Malcolm's pension was granted for past services."

The Chaiman.—" I beg to state that the gallant officer is out of order. There is a particular question before us, with which Sir J. Malcolm has nothing to do."

Mr. Right wished, before the court separated, that they should come to some right understanding on this subject. When he cutered the India-House it was with a very strong impression on his mind that this individual was about to receive a large pension without having merited it hy any adequate service; but a circumstance had occurred which equally impressed on his mind the necessity of suspending opinion in cases of this nature. He happened to go into the proprietor's reading-room, and found this resolution signed by eighteen of their respectable directors; he therefore determined not to come to any decision until he heard the reasons assigned for making this grant; and he must now say, that, from the whole of what he had heard in the course of this discussion, he was led to agree in the instice and propriety of this pension being allowed; because the hon-Chairman had stated that the pension was not only granted for past service (for it appeared that Capt. Buchanan had been long looking forward to this situation), but that the removal of this officer was occasioned by peculiar circumstances connected with an alteration in the system of the Bombay marine. It appeared that he could not hold the office of superintendant, on account of his want of naval rank; and it would be very hard on the individual to displace him from his situation, under these circumstances, without any remuneration, the more especially as the salary was so large as £3,000 a-year; therefore, in his opinion, they were only doing justice to Capt. Buchanan and the Company in agreeing to this motion. Modified as it was, it would redound to their honour, at the time of the renewal of their charter-(and all their acts should have reference to that time, particularly when they reflected on the invidious remarks and distinctions that were constantly made with respect to them), and it would go down to posterity as one of the many proofs of the justice and purity of their motives.

that

The motion, in its amended shape, the words "so long as he shall remain out of employment" being added to it, was then carried.

Mr. S. Dixon begged leave to ask a question, simply for information. He wished to know whether a grant of this nature, without the addition of any specific words, gave to the individual thus pensioned a claim for the amount of his annuity, after the Company itself may have died? He had some doubts on that subject, and therefore he asked the question. He wanted to know whether those pensions were receivable after the Company's charter had expired.

The Chairman.—" I hope the Company will never die (a laugh.) But if it should die, I believe the pensions must die with it. I have no doubt of its being understood that such pensions are to be considered payable only during the Company's life time."

from it."

" That is for twenty-Mr. S. Dixon, one years."

Mr. Wigram. " The hon. Chairman appears to have misunderstood the question. The Company is a chartered body, and this pension is regulated precisely by the same terms as operate with respect to other pensions granted under the provisions of an act of parliament, whether the right of governing be hereafter extended to the Company, or withheld

INDIAN SUTTEES.

Mr. Poynder again solicited leave to put a question.

The Chairman. " We must, I believe, get rid of the regular motions first.

Mr. Poynder. "I throw myself on your courtesy and kindness. If it be decided that I cannot put the question, which will not occupy two minutes, I must bow to the decision. The question I wish to ask is—"(Cries of order.)
The Chairman. "I am so much aware of the importance of the question which the hon proprietor is about to ask, and which has greatly agitated the public mind, that I, for one, am willing to allow it to be put."

Col. L. Stanhope. " I hope no discussion will be allowed on the question; that is the rule you have yourself laid down. If a mere question is to be asked, I shall not object to it-but I shall oppose any discussion arising on it.

" I mean to propose a Mr. Poynder. naked question, but-

Mr. S. Dixon. "I am sure the hon. proprietor has no right to ask a question, until the order of the day is read.

The Chairman. "I know the honproprietor has no right to put a question. but I hope the courtesy of the court will enable him to propose one."

Mr. Poynder. "I simply ask, as one year has now elapsed, since—''

Capt. Maxfield. "I beg, Mr. Chair.

man, to call your attention to the fact. that you yourself, on a former occasion. laid it down as a rule from the chair, that questions should not be put till the business of the day was over. If you infringe the rule thus laid down, you will place yourself in an invidious situation. It may be said that you have one rule for one party, and a different rule for ano-

The Chairman .- " I fear that I should be open to the remark which the gallant officer has made, if I suffered the hon. proprietor to proceed, I hope that he will feel this himself, and that he will desist at present from putting his question, although it is an interesting one, We shall now proceed with the business of the day."

Mr. Poynder. " It is not my intention to waste the time of the court; but, as business requires my presence elsewhere, I shall defer my question till another day." [The intention of Mr. Poynder (if the court would have allowed him) was to ask, whether the resolution against suttees, which the Court of Proprietors passed one year since, had produced any result, and whether the Court of Directors had yet had any communication to make to the proprietors on the subject. ]

SUSPENSION OF MR. COURTENAY SMITH.

The clerk read the following resolution, which Col. L. Stanhope had, at the last general court, announced his intention of moving :-

"1. That the Court of Proprietors has heard with regret, that Mr. Courtenay Smith, Chief Judge of the Supreme Native Court in Bengal, has been suspended from his office for having expressed the following opinion-namely, that 'as suits appealed to the authorities in England are decided by them after many years, and as the period of the Hon. Company's charter will shortly expire, and as, after the expiration of the term of the present charter, it is uncertain whether it will be renewed, or the government of the country will be assumed by his Majesty, in my opinion the security of the Government is such as cannot be accepted. But as this is an uncommon circumstance, it requires the concurrence of another judge.

"2. That Mr. Canning, when President of the Board of Control, acted upon the same principle as that for which Mr. C. Smith has been condemned-the former having refused to sanction a pension which extended the grant beyond the period of their charter.

"3. That the conduct of the Government in suspending this most upright judge for expressing his honest opinion, is calculated to corrupt the fountain of justice in British India; and that Mr. C. Smith, in laying down the rule of equity, and protecting the weak from the strong, has done his duty, and deserves the approbation of this court."

The Chairman.—" Before the hon. proprietor, who gave notice of this motion, proceeds, he must permit me to state to him that the records of this house have been examined, and the result has been to shew, that we are not in possession of any information on this subject at the present moment."

Col. L. Stanhope. " Then, Sir, I have to complain of the remissness of your government, in not having given information to you on a subject which has been before the public of India and of this country for five or six months. If you are not informed on this subject, it is right that an individual, even one so humble as myself, should supply you with that information which is so essential to the ends of justice. I complain that Mr. Courtenay Smith, the chief judge of the supreme native court in Bengal, has been dismissed from office for giving his omnion, in language the most temperate, mild, and reasoning, in a case between one of the Company's subjects and the government of the country. I conceive it to be the duty of every man, whenever he sees an individual oppressed, to defend him-and still more do I think it his duty to defend and support those laws which form the great pillar and support of society. I shall now read to you the opinion of Mr. Courtenay Smith, in a case in which a woman of the name of Babee Bilda was appellant, and Shah Rodeen Rush was respondent.

The Chairman.—" The hon, member will excuse me for saying, that any private moformation he may have on this subject cannot be made the foundation of any debate in this court. I think it will not be wise for the general court to entertain a question of this kind until something official is laid before it."

Col. L. Stanhope. "With great courtey towards the hon. Chairman, and in that tone I always speak to the chair, I beg leave to submit, that I am proceed-mgregularly. I think that public rumour and public report form a sufficient ground for me to proceed on, particularly when the subject has been brought before the publiament of the country by Mr. Broughamn, and the fact not then denicd, either by his Majesty's ministers or by any of the gentlemen on the other side of the bar."

The Chaiman.—" I would ask of the hon, proprietor why Mr. Brougham's motion was put off? It was put off on the very ground which I have advanced spainst entertaining this question; namely, that no information had been received on the subject."

Sir F. Ommanney. "I hope, Sir, the other business of the day will go on."

Col. L. Stanhope. "I trust, as I have given notice of this motion, that I shall not be the only person debarred from speaking on it. From what the hon: Chairman states, it appears that no motion is to be mad? in this court, until information is received by the executive body, which information, be it observed, they may suppress if they think fit. Under these circumstances, I shall put off this motion until the next court.

CARNATIC DEBT.

Capt. Maxfield rose, in pursuance of his notice, to submit a motion on this subject. The Carnatic debt, he observed, some years ago excited no common share of interest in that court, and the vigilance and zeal of the directors of the East-India Company were no less conspicuous at that time than their apparent indifference on such score was evident now. He should, in adverting to the subject, be as brief as possible; but as the studied stillness of more than twenty years had kept it much from public view, a short review of the Carnatic commission, and the causes which gave birth to it, were necessary, to avoid obscurity. It was unnecessary to go into the history of the Carnatic carlier than 1769, or to say more than that the invasion of Hyder Ally, to which that unhappy country had been subjected for a series of years, had drained its resources, while its revenue was swallowed up by the exorbitant rate of interest paid by grant of tunkas or assignments of land. In 1770 the military defence of the Carnatic war submitted to the East-India Company, while the Na-waub Mahomed Ally was beset by clamorous creditors for the liquidation of debts, real and imaginary, which were rapidly accumulating at an exorbitant rate of interest. Such debts, many of which were gross impositions, and barefaced frauds, were manufactured prior to the act which prohibited British subjects from making loans to native princes; and the embarrassment created by such claims induced Mahomed Ally, in 1781, to assign all his revenue to the East-India Company, with a view to retrieve his affairs and to recover his finances. The clamour and influence of the numerous claimants. real and fictitious, arrested the attention of a secret committee of the House of Commons; who, in a report made in 1782, called the attention of the House of Commons to the debts due by the Nawaub of the Carnatic to this Company, as well as to individuals. In 1784 an act was passed which established the Board of Commissioners; and as the place the Company then occupied in the political scale was more circumscribed than at present, present, individual influence operated powerfully to urge pretensions no less injurious to the interests of the Carnatic than of this Company. Those pretensions, supported as they were by party and faction, if not by means even still less ereditable, the Company fearlessly and successfully resisted; they interposed to prevent the plunder of the Carnatic, and rescued its inhabitants from the grinding oppressions of extortioners, and in so doing they were actively engaged from 1784 until 1805. In 1805 a commission was appointed to investigate the claims of the creditors of the Nawaub of the Carnatic, and as the Company had entered into a treaty with Azeem-al-Dow-lah, by which the civil and military government of the Carnatic, with the exclusive right to the revenues, were vested in the Company for ever, they naturally became liable to the payment of all just demands. An agreement was executed on the 10th of July 1805, by which the Company were bound to set aside out of the revenue of the Carnatic the annual sum of 3,40,000 star pagodas, to form a fund towards the payment of all the just debts of the private creditors of the Nawaubs Wallah Jah Omdubal Omrah, and Ameer-ul-Omrah, and that the Company should allow an interest of six per cent. per annum on the unappropriated balance of such fund. 'The salaries of the commissioners, of which there were three at Madras and three in this country, with two registers, amounted to about £20,000 per annum, and, large as such sum appeared to be, it was but a mere fraction of the expense entailed on the revenue of the Carnatic by that commission. Now, in order to form some estimate of the amount of funds raised upon the revenues of the Carnatic for liquidating such debt, he would commence with the sum of 3,40,000 star pagodas set apart from the revenue annually, for such purposes as directed by the act of parliament; and on the accumulation of which the Company agreed to allow interest of six per cent. to create a sinking fund for the redemption of the Carnatic debt. Taking the sum of 3,40,000 star pagodas, or £121,000, as set aside in 1805, and so on annually until 1828, with an interest of six per cent., which was indeed but half the interest the Company were paying, the aggregate in 1828 would amount to no less than £6,013,834. However, against such accumulation they had the expense of the commission, and the interest paid annually on the amount of the adjudicated debts, or the claims of the creditors which had been admitted. As he had no data to determine with precision what might have been the actual sum paid as interest, it became necessary to assume some positive amount per annum, which,

If not accurate, might at least be an anproximation to the truth of such disbursement, and leave a large remainder as the amount charged for the commission when the actual amount of the sinking fund had been subtracted from the account. As the commissioners had been occupied no less than twenty-three years in the admission or rejection of the Carnatic claims, and as no interest could have accumulated or been paid until the debts were admitted, and a stock designated Carnatic, three or four per cent. was created to represent it, if the whole of the registered Carnatic stock was divided into three parts, and the interest charged on the first-third, as paid, from 1806, on the second-third, from 1813. and on the third-third, from 1821, it was probable a larger sum on the score of interest would be so estimated than had probably been drawn from that portion of the revenue set aside for such purpose, But in order to avoid the chance of crediting too small a sum as paid for interest, and considering, that in the estimate of the sinking fund a growing interest of six per cent, had been allowed, he deemed it preferable to estimate the interest on the whole of the Carnatic three and four per cent, for the full period of twenty-three years, which he thought an adequate equivalent to the process adopted to obtain the amount of the sinking fund, had the sum set apart in 1805 remained untouched. The interest on the whole of the Carnatic stock existing at present, for a period of twenty-three years, amounted to the sum of about .....£2,068,000. Now the amount of the sinkow the amount of the small sing fund, as stated by the Company as having accumilated, was in the year 1827.....

1,914,352

3.982,352

Thus the sinking fund and interest of the debt together formed but a gross sum of £3,982,352 which taken from the sum of £6,013,831

Left the enormous sum of ...£2,061,482 for the expenses of the commission, and of the investigation of the claims of the creditors of the Carnatic, as chargeable on the funds of the Carnatic, set aside for the liquidation of the Carnatic claims. But large as the sum of £2,061,482 appeared, it was but half of the actual expense incurred as the expense of the commission and investigation; since, by the act which created such commission, it was enjoined that half the expenses of the commission and investigation should be borne by the Company, and half by the funds set apart towards the liquidation of the debt. It might therefore be assumed that the amount of the expenses of such commission and of investigation was no less than £4,122,964, while it was a notorious fact that for several years past the business of the commission had been merely nominal, and the unadjusted claims, which were trifling, and principally consisting of wages to servants and dependants of the Nawaubs, which indeed were not objects contemplated by the House of Commons when the act passed, was now the sole cause for preserving a commission, whose labours ought to have been terminated in a fifth part of the time such commission had lasted. It would he a total waste of argument to attempt to prove, that the greater the delay in investigating old accounts the greater the difficulty, or to show how many facilities were thereby offered to induce imposi-This was too evident to need illustion. train; and it was equally evident that such delay in determining just claims, were no less cruel than unjust. It would not be unreasonable to suppose that as half the expense of such commission was borne by the Company, it formed of itself a sufficient reason to induce them to bring the tardy labours of such an expensive piece of machinery to a close, if the claims of the Carnatic creditors formed no motive to do so; while in the report of the commissioners themselves in 1821 it was evident that their "occupation was gone," although their expense remained. He should now beg to read an extract from that report, which spoke for itself :-

"We had the honour to state in our lest report, that we had decrided absolutely on all the case, with the exception of a numerous class of small clams proposed to be comprehended under the new arrangement between the East-India Company and the creditors, which the returns made by the commissioners in India enabled us to adjudicate; and we also stated, that we awaited their returns our instructions in reference to the said arrangements, then in progress, for rehewing us from the breestly of invisitation for said class of small delay; and we further stated, that we had lost no delay; and we further stated, that we had lost no delay; and where, whose cases were included in the Helia Att (30 of George the Third); it is again our duty to state to the honourable house, that no return in respect to either of these subjects has as yet been recoved by us from India.

time in transmitting instructions for the investigation of the claims of Messrs. Chase and Company, and others whose cases were included in the Rielet Att (60 of George the Third); it is again our duity to stee to the honourable house, that no reduity to stee to the honourable house, that no reduity is that the control of these subjects has as yet been received by us from India.

"We had the honour to report, that we had not failed repeatedly to require returns to our several instructions, but that we apprehended that the illness of the weond commissioner, and his absence the Claim of Good Hope, and the death of the third commissioner at a later period, and the arhad corasioned the end of the honourable house, that having welled until the arrival of the ships
we have now to state to this honourable house, that having welled until the arrival of the ships which saled from Madras in the beginning of the year [123, and having received no dispatches from Light Honourable the Governor-general in Council of Brigal, who, by the fourth clause of the Deed of Agreement between the East-India Company and the reditions of the late nabobs of the Caransisioners, as such requesting that he would be pleased to call upon the commissioners to explain the causes which have so long prevented a compliance with our numerous instructions; and in the event of their explanations not proving satisfactory to his Lordship in Council, that he would adopt such measures as might seem to his Lordship and proper to ensure due and prompt obedience, on the part of the commissioners in India, to the directions which they may have already received, or may in future receive, from this board.

Here then was the evidence of the commissioners themselves that their labours ought to have closed in 1824, while it was a notorious fact, that long before that period there were few or no claims undecided which were the objects intended by parliament for the adjudication of such commissioners. So strong was that impression on the minds of the commissioners in India, and so hourly did they expect the deposition of the commission, that they appeared to have been any where but in the office at Madras, an office in which they well knew there was nothing to do, regardless of the repeated despatches of their brother commissionors in this country. It was no less evident that the India commissioners, whose salary alone amounted to near £11,000 per annum, were either absent or studiously silent to all applications from their colleagues in this country for years, and yet this expensive commission still existed in the year 1828. Now this commission, which from its duration had acquired a sort of permanence, and might indeed be considered as a branch of the public service, or rather a sort of sinecure, was created for a specific purpose, and its labours could never, when the act passed, have been expected to last for twenty-three years, or to be spun out to such a period. If such a length of time was essential to investigating the demands of the private creditors of the late Nawaubs of the Carnatic, what portion of time would be deemed sufficient to investigate the claims of this Company, should their charter not be renewed. This commission was vested with ample powers to enable it to perform its duties with despatch and efficacy; and he had no hesitation in declaring his sincere belief, that if such commission had been paid by a stated commissioner on the amount of claims rejected or admitted, instead of a fixed salary, its labours would not have lasted a fifth part of the time, and millions might have been saved to the public. If the commissioners in India were, from illness or any other cause, incapacitated, it was the duty of the Go-vernor-general in council to have supplied such deficiency by the appointment of others, and the grossest neglect or indifference, on the part of those authoritics whose duty it was to have given effect to the act of parliament which created such commission, was too palpable to require further proof. A former Chairman,

Chairman, on his (Capt. M.'s) adverting to the inability of the commissioners here to obtain an answer from their colleagues in India, stated that he knew nothing about it; and that, as the act of parlia-ment had appointed such commission. the Company could not interfere with it. Now that Chairman being a member of parliament, ought, or might be supposed to have heard or seen the report made to parliament by the commissioners; and considering the expense of the commission on the revenues of the Carnatic, as well as of the half borne by the Company, he conceived it to be the duty of every Chairman who had filled that chair since 1821 to have interfered, since the same means which were within the court's reach to obtain the act of 1805, were equally available in 1825, 1826, and 1827, should any modification of such act be essential to the public good. What a hideous contrast did the tardy and lethargic progress of this commission form with the tenth clause of the act which gave birth to it, and which described the limitation of actions, which it stated should be commenced "within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not afterwards, and should be laid in the county or place where such cause of complaint did arise," &c. Time, then, when the act was framed, was considered of some value; but yet, although this commission had lasted twenty-three years, it appeared of so little moment now, that it might probably last twenty-three years longer. In 1821, when the commission ought to have died a natural death, as by its own report appeared, the Court of Directors, either regardless or ignorant of such report, gave it new life, and increased the expense by augmenting the salary of each member £300 per annum, and creating them commissioners for the settlement of the claims of the private creditors of the Rajah of Tanjore. After such a determination, he was quite aware how futile it was to offer any observations on the subject; and many who thought with him on this occasion, prefered silence, from a conviction that no statement or argument, however close, could produce a change, and therefore such toil might be well spared. With him, however, such conclusions had no weight, and however hopeless might be the expectation of a remedy, he should neither be deterred by difficulty or dis-heartened by defeat. He could have framed a motion which, if carried, might have been fraught with public benefit; but he would content himself with a motion, the facts of which could not be denied, and the public would estimate it, and judge accordingly. He concluded by the commissioners, as laid before Parliament in 1924, that the total aggregate sterling amount of the claims were £30,216,707, 11s. 4½d.

" That it appears to this court, by the report of

**Aggregate of absolute adjudicature in favour of parties .. £2,445,630 0 81

dication in favour of parties · 40,000 17 10

£2,485,630 18 61

"Aggregate of absolute adjudications against the parties, including the portions disallowed in claims favourably adjudicated · · · · · · · · · · · · · 27,163,970 2 41

"Balance of claims remaining for adjudication, when returns containing the results of the investigation by the commissioners in India shall be received, but exclusive of a number of small claims exceeding (£8,000) the subject of the proposed arrangement, mentioned in the following paragraph......

567,097 10 51

#30,216,707 11 44

"That it also appears evident, that if, instead of a fixed salary paid to the commissioners, the sum of one per cent. commission had been allowed them for such trouble on the whole amount of claims admitted or rejected, as they were adjudicated, the expense of £302.167 sterling only would have been incurred as the remuneration to such commissioners, who would have been thus adequately paid for such investigation, and some millions thus saved to the public."

The Chairman .- The hon. gentleman who has proposed this motion has stated, that the subject of the Carnatic Debt has been put to sleep for the last twenty years. Now, I cannot account for his having made so extraordinary an assertion, when he must know, that every year the Carnatic Commissioners lay before Parliament a detailed report of their labours. As a proof that their labours have not been thrown away, I need only refer to the speech of the hon, gentleman himself, who has brought to notice a sum of £27,000,000, the amount of claims rejected by the Commissioners after a full inquiry. But, instead of entering into a detailed examination of what fell from the hon. gentleman, I shall beg leave to have an extract read from the report of the Carnatic Commissioners, which has only been handed to us on the 10th of this month; and after that extract is read, I shall propose to negative the motion of the hon. gentleman. report is dated the 15th of February, but we did not receive it till the 10th of March.

The clerk then read the following extract:—

"We shall here subjoin, for the information of this honourable house, an abstract of the amount of our adjudications to the date of the present re-on our superior of absolute adjudications in favour of parties ... £2,586,821 4 10;

"Aggregate of provisional adjudications in favour of parties ... 20,983 2 0; dications in favour of parties ... 20,983 2 0;

2,606,744 6 11

"Aggregate of absolute adjudi-cations against the parties, in-cluding the portions dissilowed on claims favourably adjudi-

.... 27,526,362 2 89

30,133,126 9 74

"Estimated balance of the amount of claims already reported to this house house which remain to be adjudicated, exclusive of the amount of a further number of small claims (between five and six thousand) forming the subject of the arrangements noticed in the following paragraphs ....

268,824 7 84

£30,401,950 17 "Since the date of the last report which we had the honour to lay before this honourable house, we have received from the commissioners at Madras have received from the commissioners at Madras the whole of the reports from Mr. Lacon, who was, in the first instance, employed on the part of the East-India Company to settle upon certain terms, at that time offered by their Government of Fort St. George, a portion of the small claims on the fund provided by the deed of the 10th July 1826, by which the Carnatic commission was appointed. The several parties who accepted those terms withdrew in consequence their claims from our jurisdiction; and we have thereby been enabled to adjudicate against them absolutely, as having accordingly nothing due to them from the said fund.

fund.

"We have the satisfaction to report to this homourable house, that we have recently received a communication from the Honourable Court of Directors of the East-India Company, informing us of the complete success of the further arrangement, so far as it has hitherto been carried into effect, which they had directed with a view to the release of the said fund from the whole of the said class of small claims. None of the particulars have yet reached us from the commissioners at Madras: but we expect to receive from them in suc-class of small claims. None of the particulars have yet reached us from the commissioners at Madras; but we expect to receive from them in succession the reports necessary to empower us finally to liberate the said from all the said claims, which have been withstrawn under the said further arrangement, so soon as under the said further arrangement, so soon as the commissioners shall have completed the details relative to the identity and the title of this numerous class of claimants. "We have further the honour to state to this honourable house, that we have passed awards once provisionally, the others absolutely) on all the claims (including the others absolutely) on all the claims (including the sunder the Relief Act, 90 Geo. III. No. 294), which the returns made by the commissioners in India have, since the date of our list report. No. 294, have provided the commissioners at Madras have given assurances of units treport of the inquiries will admit, their further reports at the remaining claims which have been referred by us for their investigation. "We have further the honour to report to this honourable house," that in consequence of the reference to the Bengal Government, noticed in our last report, the tiovenor—pagneral in Council has nonmante nouse, that in consequence of the re-ference to the Bengal Government, noticed in our last report, the Governor-general in Council has adopted measures to secure in future due regula-tiva the results of the Council of the Council and Tanjore commissions at Madras."

The Chairman .- After what has been read to the Court of Proprietors, I would submit to the discretion of the hon. gentleman, whether he had not better withdraw his motion.

Capt. Maxfield said he could have no objection to withdraw his motion, as the report which had been read was very satisfactory. Still, however, he thought the motion was not at all irrelevant or uncalled-for. In his opinion, this commission having been so long in existence, should before this have brought their lahours to a close. Some of the claimants for small sums must, in consequence of the delay, have been placed in a most Gruel situation. Many years had elapsed Assate Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

since those claims were made, and m probably numbers of them had descent to their graves while the commission were sitting in judgment on them. these small claims had been withdra from the great mass, originally, as had length been done, much good would ha been done which had been left undon He was perfectly aware of the difficulty settling those accounts; but it was subject of great importance, and of which it was the duty of the Court Directors to have considered collectivel -Motion withdrawn.

CALCUTTA STAMP REGULATIONS.

Col. L. Stanhope said he rose, in pu suance of the notice he had given, t move " That all papers connected with the late Stam Regulations at Calcutta, and transmitted to th Court of Directors, should be laid before the pre prietors."

The words, "Stamp Act," he observed sounded ominously to English ears; for i must be in the recollection of all the gentlemen present, that a stamp ac had led to the separation of America fron Great Britain. It was his intention to prove to the court that the Calcutts Stamp Act was impolitic, unjust, and illegal; that it was therefore, unwise and dangerous. In short, he should shew to all unprejudiced minds, that it contained every bad feature which it was possible for any act to possess. But previously to his going into the consideration of the distinguishing features of this great question, he felt it necessary to take a glance, and but a glance, at the circumstances under which this stamp act was imposed. The settlement of Calcutta was obtained by the British settlers from the sovereign of Indore; the conquests of the Company were accessions made by them; consequently, it was perfectly legal for the Company to pass such laws, ordinances, and regulations in the territories thus conquered by them as they might think fit. But the people of Calcutta had granted to them, under the charter of Charles the 2d. certain vested rights. Courts of law were established there in the time of George 2d: and again they had obtained additional privileges under the 53d of George 3d. In short, they had held certain rights without dispute, for upwards of 150 years; and with respect to them, this power, of which they now complained, had never been exercised, until the present moment, by the East-India Company. With respect to the stamp act itself, it appeared to have have been resorted to in consequence of a series of misgovernment. The expense of their civil establishment, which his gallant friend (Capt. Maxfield) had tiuly truly stated to the Court, exceeded in cost the military establishment of a country held by the sword (he spoke of course, of the Bengal provinces); the system which the Company pursued, of laving all sorts of restrictions in a monopolizing spirit on commerce and trade, and the wars, necessary and unnecessary, into which they had plunged, particularly that infamous war of Ava, which cost this country £13,000,000 of money (a sum greater than ever would be saved; by the exertions of the excellent finance Committee lately appointed); in consequence of the poverty induced by these different circumstances, the Hon. Company had recourse to this stamp act. Nothing could be more objectionable than the manner in which this stamp act was framed and promulgated. It was secretly framed in Calcutta; it was secretly sent to this country; it was secretly canvassed by the Court of Directors; it was secretly considered by the Board of Control; and it was as secretly sent back to Calcutta. None of those persons in that city who were to be affected by the measure, knew any thing about it until the evil burst upon their heads.

The Chairman.—The hon, gentle-man has given us notice that he will move, that all the papers received on this subject shall be laid before the Now, in making a motion proprietors. of that kind. I do not think that he has a right to go into the merits of the measure to which he has adverted. He may move for the papers, but the measure itself cannot, I think, at present form a topic of discussion before the Court of Proprietors. I think it quite irrelevant, for the hon, proprietor to go into a discussion of this subject, until the question is decided whether the papers shall or shall not be produced. I beg leave to suggest to the hou, gentleman that the subject is now before Parliament, on the petition of the inhabitants of Calcutta; and I do not think that he has a right to discuss this question on a mere motion for papers.

Col. L. Stankope continued.—In his opinion, nothing could be more illogical than, at one and the same Court, to tell a man that he had no grounds for a motion, and therefore could not make it; and subsequently, when he was stating his grounds for a motion, and so strongly too, as to make the Hon. Chairman jump from his seat, to turn round and tell him that, because something was in progress elsewhere, he had no right to proceed. He (Col. Stanhope) was perfectly in order. He was giving a history of the Stamp Act, and shewing the unjust manner in which it had been got up. He was observing, that the power of taxation, sumed-that the power of taxation had been exerted, without any right whatever. The natives, on hearing of this Stamp Act, this great and unlooked for innovation, determined to give up business, The people said, they would quit the town, and have recourse to the same measures which were formerly resorted to at Benares, when the Company, in an evil hour, thought proper to impose a house tax upon that city. What did the people of Benares do on that memorable occasion? They locked up their houses and shops, left the town, proceeded four or five miles off, and there bivouacked; till what? until the obnoxious Act was wisely and magnanimously repealed. In the present instance, the Europeans. fearing the evils which might arise from the natives quitting the town of Calcutta. persuaded them not to have recourse to that measure; and, in consequence of their representations, the subject was discussed in a temperate petition, presented to the Government. At first the Government held out some hopes that the measure would be repealed; but ultimately they determined to carry it into execution. The people then addressed a requisition to the Sheriff, and he consented to convene a meeting of the inhabitants. But the Government (like some persons now present), not liking the idea of a fair and open discussion, determined to act on an obsolete dispatch of the Court of Directors, which enabled them to prevent the people from meeting. The inhabitants then resolved to have a private meeting at the exchange, and published their intentions in the Calcutta papers. The Government, in consequence, ordered their magistrates to disperse the people; and absolutely had an intention to call out the troops to effect that object. Yes, to call out the troops in the head city of the British Indian empire. But there were some wise heads there, lawyers, who gave them better council, and they desisted from their original plan. A meeting then took place, which was distinguished by the manly and spirited discussion to which it led; and it was there resolved to petition both houses of the legislature for the repeal of this abominable Stamp Act. petition was signed by all the traders and agents of Calcutta, as well as by several of the Company's civil and military servants; and it was agreed at the meeting, that one of the Company's servants, one of the most able and talented men amongst them, Mr. Craufurd, should be sent home to carry the intention of the petitioners into effect. The Stamp Act was intended to take effect in May 1827; and the Government thought to proceed without registering the regulation. Here without representation, had been as-again they were foiled; they found it impossible to go farther without registering the regulation in the Supreme Court, and that step they were compelled to take. With respect to the provincial Stamp Act, that measure was passed in 1824; but, no one choosing to buy stamps. it was wisely discontinued by order of the East India Company. He should easily prove the first part of his argument, namely, the impolicy of the new act; because he would clearly shew that the people of British India were already taxed to the utmost. The East India Company could not control political cconomy, and it was manifestly beyond their power to obtain greater taxes than they levied at present. There were three means of adding to the resources of a state. First, by taxation; secondly, by economical reform; thirdly, by opening fresh sources of industry. Now, with respect to taxation, it had been carried to its utmost extent in British India; every collector went round to his district. and exacted the imposts until the utmost farthing was wrung from the people. Gentlemen might shake their heads, but they must be aware of the fact. They must know, in the wet season, the Government were compelled, from what they called feelings of humanity, but what he would rather demonstrate, necessity. to relax the burden of taxation.

He must say, that the more the people were taxed, the more the collector was lauded and advanced by the Honourable Company's government. This system of taxation was carried to such an extent, that Sir Edward Colebrooke had said that the Honourable Company took, on an average, one-half of the net produce of the soil, though a maxim had been laid down by Adam Smith and the wisest political economists, that no agriculture could possibly thrive if more than onethird of the produce of the soil were taken by the landlords. The native sovereigns in Hindostan were better political economists than the European governors of India. They had limited themselves, with all the bad traits of their character, to taking one-sixth, and even Akbar had confined himself to taking one-third of the produce of the land not in fallow. He would now speak respecting the salt monopoly. (Laughter, and cries of order 1)

The Chairman felt it necessary to call the hon. proprietor to order. (Hear!) The subject of the salt monopoly had nothing whatever to do with the question for the production of papers regarding the stamp-duties. (Hear!)

Col. Stanhope.—" I will prove in a very short time that it has to do with this question." (Cries of chair!)

The Chairman observed, that he must eay he thought it irrelevant to enter upon, any subject but that which the nature of the motion permitted. In his humble opinion the salt-monopoly had nothing to do with a motion for the production of papers regarding the stamp-regulations.

Col. Stanhope.—" In three words I will prove that it has to do with the question."

Mr. Dixon rose to order. He thought the hon. proprietor must be aware, that when a motion was made for the production of papers, it was quite necessary that those papers should be produced before any question respecting them could rise in that court. (Hear!)

Col. Stanhope.—" I will prove my ar-

Col. Stanhops.—" I will prove my argument in three words. I say, that you required money; you have obtained as much as can'be screwed out of the pockets of the people; then where was the use or the policy of the stamp-act?"

The Chairman.—" It is by the papers regarding the stamp-regulation that you can prove that—not by the salt-monopoly." (Hear !)

Col. Stanhope.—"I do not intend to follow the course of argument chalked out by the hon. Chairman," (Cries of order!)

Mr. Dixon (addressing the chair)—
"I call upon you, Sir, to do your duty."
The Chairman.—"I must leave it to the Court of Proprietors to judge between me and the hon. proprietor, and to signify whether he is in order." (Cries of hear!)

Col. Stanhope rose amid a din of voices, exclaiming 'Chair, chair | and order, order |' which continued during the whole time he was addressing the court.—" If (said he) you stifle my voice by noise in this court, then I cannot prove to you what I intended; but if you attend to me, I will prove that by the salt, the opium, the tin, and tea monopolies, the Company raised an immense revenue at the expense of the public at large. By the tea monopoly, they compel the old when to pay twenty times more for the tea they drank than the people in the Island of Java paid."

Capt. Maxfield rose for the purpose of suggesting to his hon. friend, that, as he must be quite sensible, amid such a noise and clamour as then prevailed, not a word could be heard, to be satisfied if his motion for the production of papers were granted, upon the understanding that he should be permitted to illustrate his argument when those papers were produced. (Hear!) He hoped his hon. friend would be as short as possible in his argument to shew the necessity for the production of the papers, and he (Capt. Maxfield) would be ready to second the motion.

Col. Stanhope.—" I am going to prove that you collect—(uproar). What! gentlemen tlemen make a noise before they hear me? That is certainly very logical in the court. I was going to prove that you collect in taxes twenty-two millions of noney—a sum greater than was collected in the time of Augustus, when Rome was mistress of the world—a sum greater than what is collected in the empire of Russia, which is the preponderating power of Europe."

Sir Francis Ommaney spoke to order.

"May I be allowed to ask the gallant colonel, for the sake of information, whether his motion related to taxes on local stamps, or on stamps in this country?

(No, no I) That is what I wish to be informed upon."

Col. Stanhope. - " The information which the hon, gentleman requires is just the information I was going to give him. I do not think it consistent with my duty to the public to indulge hon, gentlemen in their taste for conciseness at the expense of this great question. I mean to proceed step by step through the argument: but if I am stifled in this ungenerous manner, and my reasoning on the question cut short, I cannot proceed. Shall I be allowed to offer to the court on this subject as strong reasons as any man can offer? Perhaps that was saying too much, but I will offer to you very strong reasons indeed. If I am to be stifled, then I must sit down; but if you are open to conviction-if, like other educated men, you wish to have reasons offered before you grant the papers, then will I offer reasons so full and conclusive, that it will not be in your power to refuse your assent to them, or to object to the motion for papers. - (Addressing the Chairman): Will you give the papers, Sir?"

The Chairman. -" The gallant proprietor has asked me a questien, to which I will give a short and concise answer-No! (Hear!) The subject which the gallant proprietor has introduced to the notice of the court, is in two different points of view before the government in this country. (Some of the proprietors not having yet ceased laughing, in consequence of the extraordinary scene which had taken place, Col. Stanhope remarked, that some people seemed mightily amused, but he could not see any reason for their merriment. The Chairman continued). - A petition has been presented to the House of Commons from the inhabitants of Calcutta against the stampduty, and another to the King in council against the registering of the regulations in the courts of Calcutta; and while these two important questions are under the consideration of the legislature, when they are before such high authority as I have mentioned, it would be altogether out of place in us to argue such a question." (Hear !) .

Col. Stanhope:—" Will the court allow me to prove that this stamp-duty is unjust, illegal, and dangerous? Will the court allow me to prove that point, and I will do so from what the hon. Chairman has admitted; but if I am stified, I can prove nothing."

The Chairman (addressing Col. Stanhope).—" I admitted nothing, Sir. I only gave an answer to the question which had been put to me, whether I would give the papers called for. I said 'no,' and stated the reason for my withholding them."

Col. Stanhope.—" Since the hon. gentleman has had the kindness to answer my question with so much courtesy, why does he refuse to answer another question? He objects to my arguments, because they are too strong for him. He cannot bear so much logic. What is the line of argument you can bear, Sir?"

The Chairman.—" I do not object to your arguments, I only consider them lost time. That the attention of parliament has been called to the subject, shews, I apprehend, the necessity of refusing the papers. (Hear. hear!)

fusing the papers. (Hear, hear!)
Col. Stanhope.—"You have shewn no reason for refusing the papers. You have a parcel of paid lawyers in court, perhaps they might give some reason." (Loude ies of order!)

Mr. Twining suggested to the gallant colonel to defer his argument till such time as the papers might be produced. The hon. Chairman had not only stated that they could not be produced at present, but had offered such powerful reasons why they should not, that he hoped the gallant colonel would think that a sufficient answer.

Col. Stanhope -" That is to be sure the best way of getting rid of the argument, but it is merely a piece of political tactics; it is merely a method of evading the argument. (Cries of order!) The court had better hear the argument; I should have got through it before this time. Will you hear me? (No.) You cannot bear my arguments, they are too strong for you. (Laughter.) I will shew you that the people are charged twenty times as much as they ought to be for articles, in consequence of salt and opium monopoly, and the tea monopoly. Will you allow me to show the illegality of the act? (No, no!) I could shew it you as plain as the noses on your faces. (Laughter!) Will you allow me to shew the illegality of the stamp-act?"

The Charman.—" I wish the gallant proprietor would exercise a little more discretion over his feelings."

Col. Stanhope.—" When I see the whole court against me when I am about to offer fair arguments, I think it ungenerous and unbecoming in the court not be to the court of the c ar those arguments. I will now proed to consider the illegality of the act;

d as there are some lawyers present, rhap they will be able to answer me."
The Chairman.—" I am no more of a wyer than the gallant proprietor himif, but if he reflects, he must see, that e time of the court is occupied without y good being done with respect to the testion he has at heart. The hon, prooprictor cannot do any good in this age of the proceedings, and I think it ould be more judicious in him to wait or a future opportunity to deliver his senments on this subject."

Col. Stanhope.—4 I will follow your kiec. (Hear!) I now give notice of the bllowing motion, which I intend to bring award at the next general court:

"That the Court of Proprietors deplore the overlately assumed by the Government of British pida of general taxation, and the enactment of a tamp Act in Calcutta, for the following reasons, andly:—

"That the enforcement of a stamp act led to he separation of America from Great Britain.

"That the inhabitants of Calcutta have, from he time of Charles II., been exempted from the ribitary power of taxation recently claimed by he Government of British India.

"That a stamp tax, not being of the nature of goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities, or reporty, is not warranted by the 53d of Geo. III., and is illegal.

"That it is the interest of the East-India Comany to use the power of taxation to preserve their nonpoly, and thereby injure a free trade, and their rivals the merchants of Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Bristol, Birmingham, Sheffield, Hull, Leetls, &c.

"That the East-India Company atready take an average half of the net produce of the soil, and covertly obtain from the people of Calcutta in taxes £161,300, which is 122 per cent. more than exacted from the Bengal provinces: and realize a revenue of twenty-two millions: an income greater than that of Russia, the preponderating power of the world.

"That the stamp tax has been resisted in Calutta with a spirit worthy of freemen, and in the provences thereted by a passive firmness still more farmidable; and as this money grievance is of a universal and lasting nature, so will be the resistance.

"That under these awful circumstances, this tout doth humbly recommend the Supreme Government of British India magnanimously to the this unjust and dangerous Stamp Act."

ABUSE OF PATRONAGE.

The Chairman had now to state to the count, that a prosecution had been instituted in the Court of King's-Bench against certain parties, for unlawfully compining to sell the Company's patron-age. The trial came on on the 6th March last, and he had to lay before the court the short-hand writer's notes of that proceeding.

Mr. Gahagan observed, that two transactions of great interest had lately taken place; and as the hon. Chairman had thought it necessary to lay before the proprietors the ample notes of the shorthand writer, he wished to know whether they were brought here for the purpose of being printed for the use of the proprietors, or whether it was meant in conformity with the usual practice, that there the papers were if any proprietor chose to look at them.

The Chairman stated, that in conformity with the usual practice, the papers were laid upon the table of the Court of Proprietors. There was no motion before the court for their being printed, and he apprehended that there was no intention of printing the papers.

Mr. Gahagan said he was far from wishing to say any thing on the subject, but there was a question which had very much agitated the public mind, with respect to the proceedings in the treasury department.

Capt. Prescott (who evidently spoke under the influence of deep feeling) then rose. He said he appeared before the proprietors after an absence of eight or nine months. He had been their servant, man and boy, for more than forty years, and he did not think he appeared before them with a broken-down or tarnished character. He particularly desired the proprietors to examine those papers which had just been laid before them; it would be doing him the utmost favour, for without he had their confidence, he was not the man to remain behind the bar. (Hear, hear !)

THE TREASURY.

Mr. Gahagan observed, that it was most notorious that transactions of a most peculiar and uncommon nature had lately taken place in that house, and he only wished to know whether it was the intention of the Court of Directors to communicate those proceedings with respect to the appointment of Mr. Mortimer in the place of Mr. Gilmour, and with respect to the alleged use of money improperly by him. He was only speaking from reports, but he wished to know if any communication was to be made to the proprietors respecting those circumstances. If there were no intention of doing so, he had reason to believe that the subject might be brought before the court by the requisition of proprietors.

The Chairman stated, in answer to the hon, proprietor, that the Court of Directors having found it necessary to appoint a servant to a particular situation in this house, he trusted that the confidence reposed in them by the proprietors would lead the latter to believe that they have taken great pains in this matter, and that they have acted with strict propriety; and having stated this to the Court of Proprietors.

prietors, he thought he had stated all they could fairly ask or require.

Capt. Maxfield, previous to the adjournment of the court, gave notice of his intention to move at the next general court, for certain returns relative to the tonnage allowed to the captains and officers of ships belonging to this Company, on oc-casion of the opening of the trade.

There being no further business before the proprietors, the court then adjourned.

| Medras & Bengal  Bengal  Bonkay  Cepton and Bengal  Marritus & Cay- km Bengal  Septon and Bengal  Bengal Septon and Septone | LIST Appointed to sail.  188 April 189 Graves. May Ports. Graves. May Graves. Downs. May April 19075.  May April 19075. | April 2 20 1 1 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 | ST of SHIPS trading | 107 4418 2 12 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 | BEST   Shipt Name   E   Counter or Comignees   Paper   Paper | Gaptains.  Research of the CAPE of GOOD HOPE.  Reptains.  Reptains.  Reptain Lond.  Reptain Lond.  City Canal.  Samuel Balle.  Will Docks Barber, Neste, & C.  Samuel Banker.  Thomas Boyes.  Will Docks Watta and Healm.  Steph. J. Fuller.  E. I. Docks Watta and Healm.  Steph. J. Fuller.  E. I. Docks Watta and Healm.  Thomas Boyes.  Will Docks Watta and Healm.  Thomas Boyes.  Will Docks Watta and Healm.  Thomas Boyes.  Will Docks Watta and Healm.  Watta Wattan.  E. I. Docks Watta and Healm.  Wattan.  E. I. Docks Wattan.  E. I. Docks Wattan.  E. I. Docks Wattan.  Wattan.  E. I. Docks Wattan.  E. I. Docks Wattan.  Wattan.  E. I. Docks Wattan.  Wattan.  Wattan.  Wattan.  Wattan.  Will Docks Wattan.  Will Docks Wattan.  Will Docks Wattan.  Will Docks Wattan.  Wattan.  Will Docks Wattan.  Will Docks Wattan.  John Brode.  Will Docks John Lyrey, Jun.  John Brode.  Will Docks John Lyrey, Jun.  John Brode.  Watthers A. Wattan.  Watthers Lond Docks Watthers Wattan. | Where posterior is the process of the posterior is the po | or Freaght or  and W. Aber  E. & C.O., Clean  Freedam, Fench  Jernemani-ct.  celham, Fench  Jernemani-col  Jernemani-col |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------|---------------------|-----------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| S. Wales                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                         | May 54                                       | 11 Wave             | 255250250250250250250 | 380) Johnston and Masburn. Wm. Hide347 William Asquith                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Lon. DocksLon. DocksLon. DocksLon. Docks                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Docks Tromin and Man.  Cowput's Crownini.  Docks Tomin and Man.  Docks M. Andrew and J. Binner, Church-  Egyn March 1888.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

| æ    |
|------|
| . S. |
| ř    |
| a    |
| Ε    |
| 8    |
| ŭ    |
|      |
| e,   |
| ē    |
| á    |
| ٠,   |
| ü    |
| 5    |
| ä    |
| Ę    |
| -    |
| -≅   |
| ÷    |
| £    |
| Ë    |
| Ŀ    |
| 8-   |
| 827  |
| 18   |
| Ę    |
| S    |
| ĕ,   |
| 0)   |
| ŧ    |
| ě    |
|      |
| S    |
| SHIP |
| Ξ    |
| S    |
| Š    |
| 'n   |
| Z    |
| ζ.   |
| Ξ    |
| Ž    |
| COM  |
|      |
| 3    |
| ā    |
| Z    |
| Ξ    |
| ÷    |
| Ś    |
| ۲.   |
| 4    |
|      |

| WhenSailed                                                    | 182857 an                                                                                     | 9                                                                                                            | 94.Mar                                              | 8 4 4                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 58 e                                                                                                  | 9.                                               | 2 E                                                                                                                                                | Mar                         | 9.9                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1                                                                                |                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                     |   |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---|
| To sanitoGraves-in theDowns.                          | 1888                                                                                              | S.                                                                                                           | 48                                                  | 6Feb.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                       | 4                                                | ā_0/i                                                                                                                                              | Mar. 1                      | 146                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                  | Mak                                                                                                                                          | S. Sate                                                                                             |   |
| -pus                                                              | 1827.                                                                                             | Dec.                                                                                                         | 8 do.                                               | Jan.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                       |                                                  | -                                                                                                                                                  | 1 40.                       | Feb. 2                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Mars                                                                             | Apr. 19                                                                                                                                      | May 18                                                                                              |   |
| To be Affoat.                                                     |                                                                                                   | Signos apec.                                                                                                 | 3Dec. 18 do. 23 do.                                 | 18 do. 1Jan. 6Feb.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 1828.                                                                                                 | Jan. 16de.                                       |                                                                                                                                                    | 16 do. 31 do. 7 Mar. 11 Mar | IFeb. 15Feb. 21 do. 12 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 1Mar. 15Mar 20Apr.                                                               | 30 do. 14 Apr. 19May                                                                                                                         | 29 Apr. 13 May 18 Jun                                                                               | - |
| Consignments.                                                     | Bombay & China                                                                                    | St. Helena, Ben-                                                                                             | Bengal & China                                      | Bengal & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Bombay & China                                                                                        | Bengal & China                                   | St. Helcna, Bom-                                                                                                                                   | Madras & China              | Sauritus & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | China                                                                            | Madras & Bengal                                                                                                                              | Bengal                                                                                              |   |
| Pursers.                                                          | J. Giles                                                                                          | J. H. Lanyon                                                                                                 | W. Maltman                                          | John LenoxJ. W. RoseW.S.Spawforth                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | Wr. Dallas                                                                                            | Wm. Ainslie.                                     | T.Collingwood                                                                                                                                      | Peter Milne                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | R. Dudgeon.                                                                      | Alex. Crowe.                                                                                                                                 | Honey Millet                                                                                        |   |
| Surgeons.                                                         | Francis BurlinRobt. Harvey                                                                    | John Millard                                                                                                 | Jas. BeveridgeDavid Scott.                      | T. Davidson.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | W. Hitchcock                                                                                          | Henry Arnot                                      | Thes. Cron                                                                                                                                         | Geo. Comb                   | J. Campbell                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 1 Jas. Jameson David Forest R. Dudgeon.                                          | F. Shaw R. Greig Alex. Crowe.                                                                                                                | M. Murray . Edward Voss Wm. Scott Honey Millet J. Copling G. Abbott R. Renwick W. I. Irwn           |   |
| First Officers. Second Officers, Third Officers, Fourth Officers. | J. K. Jolly                                                                                       | Thos. N.Were                                                                                                 | R. Saunders.P. J. Maxwell                       | H. DalrympleC. Udale                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | W. Pitcaim                                                                                            | E. Dupuis Henry Smith                            | John Willie                                                                                                                                        | J. H. Thom                  | R. Howard                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Jas. Jameson                                                                     | F. Shaw                                                                                                                                      | Edward Voss                                                                                         |   |
| Thurd Officers.                                                   | R. BuckleGeo. Waller                                                                          | Jas. M. Baird                                                                                                | D. RobertsonJohn Rose                           | J.W.EdmondsSamuel Hyde                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | H. Shepherd                                                                                           | Boulter J. BellWm. Pigott                    | H. J. Wolfe                                                                                                                                        | R. Burroughes               | J. Dalrymple                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | O. Richardson                                                                    | G. M. Abbott                                                                                                                                 | M. Murray . Edward Voss                                                                             |   |
| Second Officers                                                   | James RicketD. Marshall                                                                       | Henry Burn                                                                                                   | J. ElphinstoneD. J. Ward                        | T. ShepherdCW Loveridge                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Geo.Frampton                                                                                          | F. G. Moore                                      | John Fenn                                                                                                                                          | T.W. Marriott               | Henry Wise                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | W.K.Packman                                                                      | Henry Harris                                                                                                                                 | I. Muller                                                                                           |   |
|                                                                   | John Shute                                                                                        | G. Braithwaite                                                                                               | W. Drayner                                          | H. L. ThomasEdw. Jacob                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Jas. S. Biles                                                                                         | Win. Pulham                                      | W. Haylett                                                                                                                                         | Geo. Deudney                | G. C. Kennedy                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | A. Rivers                                                                        | R.H. TreherneWm. Maronis                                                                                                                 | W.H.HopkmsH M Sterndale                                                                         |   |
| Commanders.                                                       | M. HamiltonHenry Bax                                                                          | Joseph Stanton                                                                                               | Alex. ChrystieJ. O. M'TaggartJ. S. H. Erseg | Fred. MadanChas. S. TiminsF. M. Daniell                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | John Innes                                                                                            | Thos. W. Barrow                                  | T. Larkins W. Haylett John Fenn H. J. Wolfe John Willie Thes. Cron T. Collingwood James Walker. James Sexton F. Machinem. John Discipa. Chas. Box. | Thomas Blair                | Thomas Dunkin                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | W. F. Parrer 13s Wilers W. K. Packman O. Richardson Jas. Jameson W. F. Parrer 1. | Henry HosmerThos. Marquis                                                                                                                | C. E. Mangles                                                                                       |   |
| ManagingOwners.                                               | 1826 G. Palmer M. Hamilton John Shute James Rickett R. Buckle J. K. Jolly Francis Burlin J. Giles | 1388 James Sins Joseph Stanton G Braithwaite Henry Burn Jas. M. Baird Thos. N.Were John Millard J. H. Lanyon | S. MarjoribanksJoseph HareJ. Mac Tammet     | S. MarjoribanksJohn F. TiminsW. E. Ferrer                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 1300 H. Bonham John Innes Jas. S. Biles Geo-Frampton H. Shepherd . W. Pitcaim W. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas | Company's Ship                                   | W. C. Drysdale                                                                                                                                     | Joseph Hare                 | 1311 J. H. Gledstang Thomas Dunkin G. C. Kennedy Henry Wise . J. Dalrymple R. Howard . J. Campbell . John Main . 1286 Company's Stern Philip Baulis . T. R. Benefit J. R. Port J. R. Port J. P. Port J. | Company's Ship                                                                   | 938 H. Bonham. Henry Hosmer R. H. Trehernel Henry Harris G. M. Abbott 1024 Thos. Milrov Thos. Marquis. Wm. Maronis J. A. Sephonse Chas. Whre | 965 O. Wigram C. E. Mangles W. H. Hopkins958 H. Bonham T. F. Balderston H M Sterndale J. Miller |   |
| Tons.                                                             | 1325                                                                                              | 1283                                                                                                         | 388                                                 | 115883.5583.00                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 1330                                                                                                  | 1389                                             |                                                                                                                                                    |                             | 1311                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 1332                                                                             |                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                     |   |
| Suño A                                                            | Dvarica                                                                                           | 8 General Harris                                                                                             | of Homes Coutt                                      | Beneficially and Market Market Market Harden Harden Harden Market | Abercrombie   Robinson                                                                                | Plant of Bancarias 1st Company's Sup B. Brougnon | 8 Marquis Camden 1261 W. C. Drysdale Macqueen 1333 John Campbell                                                                                   |                             | 8 Castle Huntly                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | London 1332 Company's ShipOrwell 1335 Matthew Isoch                          | Prince Regent                                                                                                                                | Marchioness of Ely                                                                                  |   |

PRICE CURRENT, March 26.

| Coffee, Java                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                           | PK    | IC  | E ( | CON  | ını | £. e. d. £.                               |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------|-------|-----|-----|------|-----|-------------------------------------------|
| Coffee                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | EAST-INDIA P                              | RODU  | CE. |     |      |     |                                           |
| Coffee   Java   Coffee   Coffee   Java   Cof   |                                           | £.    | a   |     | ٠.   | A   | Dumbo and Violet 0 10 9 0 to              |
| Corporation   1   3   0   1   18   0   Violet   Note   0   7   0   0   0   0   7   0   0   0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Coffee Tone                               |       |     |     |      |     | Extra fine Violet ···· 0 9 9 - 0 10 0     |
| Semintra                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                           |       |     |     |      |     | — Violet ······ 0 7 0 — 0 0 0             |
| Bourbon                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | - Cheriton                                |       |     |     |      | ŏ   | Violet and Copper ·· U n y _ 0 7 a        |
| Mocha                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                           |       | _   |     |      | -   | Fine Copper 0 5 6 0 7 0                   |
| Cotton, Surat.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Mocha                                     | 3 5   | 0   | -   | 7 10 | 0   | Copper U 5 0 — () 7 a                     |
| Madras                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                           | 0 0   | 4   |     |      |     |                                           |
| Bengal                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | - Madras ·····                            |       |     |     |      |     |                                           |
| Bourbon                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Bengal                                    |       |     | _   |      |     | 200 4111                                  |
| Aloes, Epsica   cwt   10   0   0   14   0   0     16   0   0   17   0   0   10   0   0   0   0   0   0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                           | 0 0   | б   | -   | 0 0  | 10  | m                                         |
| Amises, Sparts                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Drugs & for Dyeing.                       |       | ^   | ,   |      | Λ   | Rice, Bengal White cwt. 0 11 0 - 0 14 6   |
| Annisests, stat. 2 5 0 Borax, Refined. 2 5 0 Carphire 7 Carphire 7 Cardamons, Malabar. 5 Cardamons, Malabar. 6 Carphire 7 Cardamons, Malabar. 7 Casia Buds                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                           | 10 0  | v   |     | 4 0  | v   |                                           |
| Sago                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Anniseeds, Star                           | 0 K   | ۸   |     |      |     | 0.00                                      |
| Cambrie   7   15   0   Saltpetre   1   4   6   1   5   0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | Borax, Renned or Tincal                   |       |     |     |      |     | Sago 0 15 0 - 1 10 a                      |
| Carlamoms, Malabar - lb                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Campbire                                  |       |     |     |      |     | Saltnetre                                 |
| Ceylon                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Cardamoms, Malabar · lb                   | • • • |     |     |      |     | Silk, Bengal SkeinIb                      |
| Cassia Buds                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Cevlon                                    | 0 1   | 0   |     |      |     | 0.15 0                                    |
| Lignea                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                           |       |     |     |      |     |                                           |
| Dargon's Blood.   Cet.   3   0   0   15   0   0   Cloves   0   0   9   0   2   1   0   0   0   0   0   0   0   0   0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Lignea ····                               |       |     |     |      |     | 0 1 0 10 0                                |
| Dragon's Blood.   CWC.   20   0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Castor Oiltb                              |       |     |     |      |     |                                           |
| Guin Aminomac, lump   3 0 0 - 3 5 0   Nittnegs   0 2 8 - 0 3 4   Arable   1 5 0 - 3 15 0   Glinger   cwt. 0 16 0 - 1 9 0   Assafettda   1 0 0 - 3 15 0   Pelper, Black   b0 0 4 - 0 0 15 0   Benjamin   2 0 0 - 50 0 0   Pelper, Black   b0 0 4 - 0 0 15 0   Animin   3 0 0 - 9 0 0   Sugar, Bengal   cvt. 1 16 0 - 117 0   Myrrh   3 0 0 - 15 0 0   Sugar, Bengal   cvt. 1 16 0 - 117 0   Myrrh   3 0 0 - 15 0 0   Sugar, Bengal   cvt. 1 16 0 - 117 0   Myrrh   3 0 0 - 15 0 0   Sugar, Bengal   cvt. 1 16 0 - 117 0   Myrrh   3 0 0 - 15 0 0   Sama and China   1 10 0 - 1 13 0   Kino   14 0   Tea, Bohra   b0 1 5 0   Ceapou   b0 1 5 0   Dye   0 3 6 - 0 3 7   Compou   0 2 1   - 0 3 0   Dye   0 3 6 - 0 3 7   Compou   0 2 1   - 0 3 0   Shell   cwt   4 0 0 - 5 5 0   Campol   0 2 6   - 0 3 3   Shell   cwt   4 0 0 - 5 5 0   Twinklay   0 2 3 0   3 0   Musk, China   0 1 5 0   15 0   14 0   Clores   b0 0 9   - 0 10 0   Tyson   11 yson   0 2 4 0   3 10   Cloves   b0 0 9   - 0 10 0   Tyson   11 yson   0 3 4   0 3 10   Nutmegs   0 2 9 - 0 3 0   Tortoiseshell   1 10 0   1 16   Senna   b0 0 9   c 2 10 0   Tortoiseshell   1 10 0   0   Senna   b0 0 9   c 2 10 0   Sperm   52 0 0   China   1 16 0 2 0 0   Wood, Bue Gum   ton 0 6 0 0 7 0   Bull   1 4 0 - 1 10 0   Cloder   0 0 0 0 0 0   Bull   1 3 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Dragon's Blood cwt.                       |       |     |     |      |     |                                           |
| Assafectida                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Gum Ammoniac, lump                        |       |     |     |      |     |                                           |
| Resignation   2   0   0   0   0   0   0   0   0   0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | Arabic                                    |       |     |     |      |     | Ginger · · · · · · · cwt. 0 16 0 1 0 0    |
| Best                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Assatoetida                               |       |     |     |      |     | Pepper, Black ··· ·· fb 0 0 4 0 0 5       |
| Ganbogium 25 0 0 - 27 0 0 Sugar, Bengal cvt. 146 0 - 117 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Animi                                     |       |     |     |      |     | White 0 0 8 - 0 1 9                       |
| — Myrrh                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Gambogium                                 |       |     |     |      | Ö   | Sugar, Bengal cwt. 1 16 0 - 1 17 0        |
| Oilbanum 210 0 - 510 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 2 0 Conçou 0 0 2 1 - 3 5 Lac Lake tb 0 1 0 0 - 3 0 Conçou 0 0 2 1 - 3 5 Lac Lake tb 0 1 0 0 5 0 Conçou 0 0 2 0 - 3 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 5 0 0 1 3 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 0 2 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 0 2 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 0 2 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 0 2 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 0 2 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 5 0 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 5 0 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 5 0 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 0 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobeas tb 0 1 1 1 1 0 Tea, nobea | Myrrh                                     | 3.0   | 0   | - 1 | 5 0  | 0   | Siam and China 1 10 0 1 13 0              |
| Kino                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Olibanum · · · · · · · ·                  |       | 0   | _   | 5 10 | 0   |                                           |
| Lac Lake                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | Kino                                      | 14 0  |     |     |      | _   | rea, Bonea                                |
| Shell                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Lac Lake tb                               | 0 1   |     |     |      |     | Congou 0 2 1 - 0 3 5                      |
| Shell                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Dye                                       |       |     |     |      |     | Campoi 0 2 6 0 3 3                        |
| Stick   Stic   | Shell ····· cwt.                          |       |     | _   |      |     |                                           |
| Musk, China   0.2   4   0.3   10   0.0   China   0.1   10   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0   0.0    | - Stick                                   |       |     | _   |      |     | Pekoc 0 3 7 - 0 4 4                       |
| Oil, tastia  — Climamon                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Musk, Chinaoz.                            |       |     | _   | 1 10 | v   | — Hyson Skin · · · · · · · 0 2 4 — 0 3 10 |
| Civers                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Oil, Cassia                               |       |     | _   | 0 10 | 0   | Hyson 0 4 3 0 6 1                         |
| Mare                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Clarice                                   |       |     |     | 0 -0 | •   | Young Hyson · · · · · · 0 3 4 - 0 3 8     |
| Nutmegs                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Mace                                      |       |     | _   | 0 0  | 3   | — Gunpowder · · · · · · · 0 4 4 - 0 5 2   |
| Oplum                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Nutmees                                   |       | 9   | _   | 0 3  | Ò   |                                           |
| Rhubarb                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Onlum                                     |       |     |     |      |     | Wood, Sanders Redton 9 0 0 - 10 0 0       |
| Sal Ammoniac     cwt. 2 15 0 - 2 18 0       Senna     bb 0 0 9 - 0 2 0       Senna     bb 0 0 9 - 0 2 0       Turmeric, Java     cwt. 1 10 0 - 1 13 0     — Sperm     82 0 0       — Bengal     1 4 0 - 1 10 0     — Ilead Matter     86 0 0     86 0 0       — China     1 16 0 - 2 0 0     Wool     15 0 0 10 - 0 5 0       Galls, in Sorts     3 0 0 - 3 10 0     Wood, Blue Gum     ton 0 6 0 - 0 7 0       — Blue     3 15 0 - 4 0 0     — Codar     0 0 6 0 - 0 7 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | Rhubarb                                   |       |     | _   |      |     | AUSTRALIAN PRODUCE.                       |
| Senna                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Sal Ammoniaccwt.                          |       |     | -   |      |     |                                           |
| Turmere, Java Cwi 1 4 0 — 110 0 — Head Matter 06 0 0 — Bengal 1 4 0 — 1 10 0 — Head Matter 06 0 0 0 — China 1 16 0 — 2 0 0 Wool 0 10 0 10 — 0 5 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Senna · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · |       |     | _   |      |     |                                           |
| Bengal 116 0 = 2 0 0 Wood 15 0 10 = 0 5 0  Galls, in Sorts 3 0 0 = 3 10 0 Wood, Blue Gum                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | Turmeric, Java · · · cwt.                 |       |     |     |      |     |                                           |
| Galls, in Sorts                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Bengal ·····                              |       |     | _   |      |     |                                           |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Unina                                     |       |     | _   |      |     |                                           |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Galls, in Sorts                           |       |     | _   |      |     |                                           |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | , Dide                                    | J 10  |     |     |      |     |                                           |

| ' | Ξ. |  | 1000 | A 17 | OTOO | 17 C | from Of | Fahmerman | to 25 March | 6 |
|---|----|------|----------|------|------|------|---------|-----------|-------------|---|
|   |    |      |          |      |      |      |         |           |             |   |

| Feb. | BankStock. | 3 Pr. Ct.Red. | 3 Pr. Ct.Consols. | 3. Pr.Ct.Consols. | 3] Pr.Ct.Red. | N. 4Pr.C.Ann. | LongAnnuities. | IndiaStock. | IndiaBonds. | Exch.Bills.  |
|------|----------------|-------------------|-----------------------|-----------------------|-------------------|-------------------|--------------------|-----------------|-----------------|------------------|
| 26   | 20617          | 837841            | 83183                 | 918918                | 918918            | 10011001          | 191 191            | 245             | 86 87p          |                  |
| 27   | 2061           | 041043            | 242245                | G18Q1I                | 01502             | -10011100#        | 194 198            | 244             | 85 86p          |                  |
| 28   | 20617          | 011015            | ROLLOS                | 99 991                | 014051            | 10041004          | 195 198            | 244443          | _               | 55 571           |
| 29   | 2063           | 83 84             | 821831                | 914914                | 914913            | 100,100           | 197, 191           | 2431            | _               | 53 57            |
| Mar. |                | 4                 | , ,                   | " '                   | -                 |                   |                    |                 |                 | TO 50            |
| 1    |                | 847               | 831838                |                       |                   | 10011003          |                    |                 | 86 87p          |                  |
| 3    | 207            | 837841            | 83 83 8               | -                     | 91392             | 1001 1001         | -                  |                 | 87 88p          |                  |
|      | 20617          | 831848            | 834833                | 921                   | 913921            | 100 100           |                    |                 |                 | 57 59            |
| 5    |                |                   | 838837                | 921223                | _                 | 10011001          |                    | _               | 89 88p          | 58 5958 60   |
| 6    |                |                   | 83 84 1               |                       | -                 | 10011001          |                    | _               | 89 90p          |                  |
| 7    |                |                   | 841                   |                       |                   | 100 å 100 g       | _                  | -               | 90 91p          | 20 00            |
| 8    | _              | _                 | 831841                | _                     | -                 | 100, 100          | -                  | _               |                 | 59 60[58 60] |
| 10   | _              |                   | 83 83 8               |                       | _                 | 100 100 }         |                    | -               | 90p             | 50 COL           |
| 11   | _              |                   | 831831                | -                     |                   | 100 3 100 $      |                    |                 | 89 90p          | 58 60p           |
| 12   | _              |                   | 831                   | _                     |                   | 100 100           |                    |                 | 900             | 56 59p           |
| 13   |                | _                 | 823824                | -                     |                   | 99}100            | - 1                |                 | 87 89p          |                  |
| 14   | _              |                   | 82 827                |                       |                   | 9971001           | - 1                |                 | 86 88p          | 58 59            |
| 15   |                |                   | 831831                | _                     |                   | 9971001           |                    |                 |                 |                  |
| 17   | =              |                   | 83 ដ ំ83ខ្លី   |                       |                   | 100 1100          |                    |                 | 88 89p          |                  |
| 18   |                | _                 | 823827                |                       |                   | 100 100}          |                    |                 | 87 89p          | 57 58            |
| 19   | _              |                   | 82 [83]               |                       |                   | 10011004          |                    |                 |                 | 57 58F           |
| 20   |                |                   | 82183                 | _                     | _                 | 10011008          |                    | _               | 88 89p          |                  |
| 21   | - 1            |                   | 82383                 |                       | -                 | 10011001          | -                  | _               | 99 99b          | 56 57F           |
| 22   | =              |                   | 82183                 |                       |                   | 100   100         | -                  | _               | 89 90p          | 56 5 7 P  |
| 24   | _              |                   | 82 834                | -                     | -          | 100 1001          |                    | -               | 90P             |                  |
| 25   |                |                   | _ '                   |                       | -                 | -                 | -                  |                 | _               |                  |
|      |                |                   |                       |                       |                   | 9.0               | 1:II am            | d Lombe         | ard Stre        | et               |

ASIATIC JOURNAL

FOR

MAY, 1828.

Original Communications,

8c. 8c. 8c. #

THE HINDU DRAMA.

WE bring this long article to a close by an analysis of the remaining dramas in Mr. Wilson's collection, the Mudrá Rákshasa and the Retnávalí.

The Mudrá Rákshasa, or "the Signet of the Minister," though referred to the Nátaka species of the Rúpaka class of dramas, is of a peculiar character. It is wholly political, and develops the principles of Hindu state policy and intrigue. It is remarkable, moreover, for being founded upon the history of the celebrated Chandragupta, supposed to be identical with the Sandrocottus (or, as his name is written by Athenæus, Sandrakoptus,) of the Greek historians.

Mr. Wilson has prefixed to the play a concise epitome of the evidence in favour of the identity referred to, and which, freed from the extraneous sophistications of Sir Wm. Jones and Colonel Wilford, amounts to very little short of demonstration. He has shewn that "the Greek and Hindu writers concur in the name, in the private history, in the political elevation, and in the nation and capital of an Indian king, nearly, if not exactly contemporary with Alexander, to a degree of approximation that cannot possibly be the work of accident."

The high rank of its author is another remarkable circumstance in the history of this play; the prelude declares the drama to be the work of Visakha Datta, the son of Prithu Maharaja, and grandson of the Samanta, or chieftain, Vatéswara Datta. Mr. Wilson thinks it not impossible, though he candidly acknowledges there is not sufficient ground to conclude, that the prince here intended was the Chohan chief of Ajmér, Prithu Raj, who was killed at the end of the twelfth century by the Mohammedans. The concluding lines of the play refer to the then existing troubles occasioned by the Mlechchas, who may not unreasonably be identified with the Pathan invaders of Hindustan.

The opening of this play is connected in an artful, as well as amusing, manner with the induction, or prelude. The manager is speaking, in astronomical phraseology, of the efforts of a planet (Ketu) to depose the moon (Chandra), Asiat, Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149 4 G when when he is supposed to be overheard behind the scenes by one of the principal characters in the play, the minister of Chandragupta, Chánakya, or Vishnugupta, who, concluding that the deposition of that monarch (placed on the throne of Pálatiputra at the death of Nanda, slain through the contrivance of Chánakya), by Malayaketu, was alluded to, rushes abruptly on the stage.

A dialogue ensues between this minister, his pupil, and one of the spies sent forth by the former amongst the people, in furtherance of his stratagems to gain over or to ruin Rákshasa, the minister of the late king, who had taken refuge with the king of the mountains, or "the great Mlechcha Rájá," leaving his wife and child in concealment in Pálatiputra. The spy, who is disguised as sort of showman, relates how he discovered the retreat of Rákshasa's wife, and obtained from her by dexterity that minister's seal-ring (Anguliya Mudrá), an acceptable prize to Chánakya, furnishing a means whereby his enemy may be subdued. He accordingly writes letters, to which he attaches the signet of Rákshasa, calculated to make the latter an object of suspicion to his protectors; and he secures the person of Chandana Dás, the faithful friend to whose care the ex-minister had entrusted his family (and who refuses to become the instrument of Chánakya), in the full persuasion that when Rákshasa learns the danger of his friend, he will Be eager to prevent the sacrifice, And, ere he suffer that this merchant lose His life for him, will offer up his own, As much less precious than so dear a friend.

The plot now thickens: the artifices of Chandragupta's minister have raised an apparent rebellion against the prince's authority, by secretly promoting the escape of certain malcontents, who are accompanied by his own creatures, in order that Rákshasa may fall into his toils.

The ex-minister, meanwhile, was not backward in devising expedients to counterwork the machinations of his antagonist, and to overturn the throne of the "base-born" usurper, Chandragupta. But his stratagems were eminently unsuccessful, being foiled by the superior cunning of his rival. One of the plots of Rákshása was thus detected: he had concealed a party of men in a subterranean chamber which led to that where Chandragupta slept, whom they were to kill in the night. Chánakya, however, inspecting the apartment of the king, observed a line of ants come through a crevice in the wall, bearing the fragments of a recent meal; he thence concluded that the feeders were in an adjoining place, and, commanding the pavilion to be fired, they were destroyed.

By a series of artifices and intrigues, Chánakya at length succeeds in convincing the prince by whom Rákshasa is entertained, that he was the murderer of his father, and had plotted to deliver up the prince himself a captive to Chandragupta, whose minister Rákshasa was supposed to be ambitious of becoming, the office being vacant by the dismissal of Chánakya.

This last measure was a deep stroke of policy on the part of Chánakya, which imposed upon Chandragupta himself. That prince had been incensed at the officiousness of his minister in countermanding a festival, as well as at his lofty behaviour at an interview, where a bard, in the interest of Rákshasa, unwittingly promotes the views of Chánakya, having widened the breach between him and the prince by singing the following verses:

Shall monarchs mighty in innumerous bands Allow their slaves their hests to disobey? Shall the gaunt Lion suffer puny hands, To rend his talons and his fangs away?—
Is that god-given strength to be reviled,
From Brahmá that proceeds,
And upon carth on kings alone conferred;
Or on the monarch of the wild,
The clephant, who leads,
Through shady groves and dells, his fierce yet subject herd?
What makes a monarch? not his throne—his crown—
But men to work his will—to tremble at his frown.

The expostulation of Chandragupta induces his minister to make an attempt, intentionally feeble, to justify himself. When reproached by the monarch for suffering Ráksñasa to quit the capital unmolested, instead of arresting him fagrante delicto, Chánakya's reply alleges the very ground of defence on which Cicero vindicated his conduct in suffering the escape of Catiline, and in almost the orator's words:

I would not give it public note—his friends
Were many—of fidelity approved—
Devoted to his will—inflexibly attached,
By his own worth, and by long service, to him.
All too that cherished Nanda's memory,
Made common cause with him, and his vast wealth
Secured adherents numerous and brave—
Provided with these hostile means, he long
Maintained a dangerous ferment in the capital,
But like a barbed arrow from a wound,
By dexterous sleight extracted, he was driven
At length to quit the city, and remote Wage an avowed and less alarming enmity.

And he concludes:

'Tis craft that snares the monarch of the woods, And stratagem alone must win us Rákshasa.

The minister, however, resigns his office, throwing at the feet of Chandragupta his sastram, or ministerial dagger. The intelligence of this event excites hopes in the breast of Rákshasa that Chandragupta, deprived of his skilful adviser, will be an easy prey; whilst Malayaketu, the prince who protects him, and whose forces are about to advance against Pátaliputra, is prevailed upon by the influence of Chánakya's intrigues to believe that this new energy proceeds from some treacherous design on the part of Rákshasa.

In short, the schemes of Chanakya are crowned with complete success. Malayaketu and his confederates fall into his hands, and Rákshasa is urged by his generous ardour to save his friend Chandana Dás from the stake by delivering himself up to his foe. This scene deserves to be given at length:

Enter Siddhárthaka as a Chándala or public executioner.

Take heed, my masters, and let every one who values his life, his wealth, his family,—avoid the displeasure of the King, as he would poison.—Sickness is a simple demolition of man's life, and unwholesome diet noxious only to himself; but he and all his perish, if he incur regal indignation. If you doubt what I say, hehold this Chandana Dás led to execution, and followed by his wife and child. What is that you say?—Is there no chance of his escape?—yes—if he give up the family of Rákshasa—how? say you—give up those whom he is pledged to shelter for the sake of his life?—he will never be guilty of so base an action—then be assured of his paying a visit to a better world: so much for you.

(Enter Chandana Das, dressed for execution, bearing the stake upon his shoulder, followed followed by his Wife and Child, and by Samiddharthaka, as 2d Executioner, with Attendants and Guards.)

Wife. Ah woe is me !- that such disgraceful fate,

A felon's doom, should close a life of credit!

Ah ruthless destiny !- that barbarous man

Should persecute alike both friend and foe,

The guilty and the innocent confounding!

A savage hunter, who in thickets spares not

The beautiful and inoffensive deer.

Chand. Where is my faithful friend? will none reply

To my last supplications? ah, how few

Approach in adverse season! those alone Are friends, who hold on with us to the last.

And follow us with eyes suffused with tears.

Sid. This is the place-so now dismiss your family.

Chand. Withdraw, my love, and lead our boy along.

Wife. Forgive me, husband-to another world

Thy steps are bound, and not to foreign realms,

Whence in due time they homeward will return:

No common farewell our leave-taking now

Admits, nor must the partner of thy fate

Leave thee to trace thy solitary way.

Chand. What dost thou mean?

Wife. To follow thee in death.

Chand. Think not of this-our boy's yet tender years

Demand affectionate and guardian care.

Wife. I leave him to our household gods, nor fear

They will desert his youth-come, my dear boy,

And bid thy sire a long and last farewell.

Boy. (Falling at his feet.) What must I do, my father, when deprived Of thce?

Chand. Go dwell where'er Chánakya is not.

Sid. Come, Sir, the stake is planted.

Wife. Oh save us, save us!

Chand. Yield not thus to grief.

Exalted Princes, Nanda's glorious sons,

Who stooped to solace misery from the throne,

Have gone before me to the realms of heaven:

And that I die by no infirmity

Of frail humanity, but for a friend,

Is subject of rejoicing, not of tears.

Sid. Come, come, we have delayed too long-bring him, and raise him on the stake -his family will retire of their own accord fast enough.

Chand. One moment only-let me kiss my boy-

Loved child, adieu-remember, all that lives

Must die-but he that to preserve his friend

Expires-dies with honour.

Boy. Such a lesson

There scarcely needed-for full well I know,

Faith to a friend is still our house's fame.

Sid. Bring him along (they lead Chandana Das towards the stake).

Wife. Oh, mercy, mercy!

Enter Råkshasa hastily.

Rak. Lady, dismiss your fears.

Hold, officers, your prisoner must not suffer.

He who, in safety long udmoved, surveyed

His sovereign's fall, the danger of his friends, And calmly, as if seated at a festival, Looked down upon their sufferings, comes at last, To claim, of right his own, these marks of shame. These garlands and insignia of the grave. Chand. Oh, what is this? Rak. The feeble imitation Of your exalted virtue. Chand. No-our ruin-What hast thou done?-think'st thou thy destruction, A grateful sight to me? Rak. Hear me. my friend : Life is to every living creature dear-In saving thine, I have performed my duty, And do not heed thy censures-(to the officer)-hence, report These welcome tidings to your ruthless lord.

Sid. (To Samiddh.) Hark ye, comrade, do you lead Chandana Dás under the shade of those trees; I will go and inform his Excellency that Rúkshasa is secured.

Exeunt severally.

The interview between the two rival ministers, which occurs in the last scene of the play, discloses the high opinion which each entertains for the other. After mutual expressions of admiration, Chánakya reveals to his late rival the means whereby he had foiled his plans, and as a proof of his friendship, he prevails upon Chandragupta to bestow upon Rákshasa the office of prime minister: it being the main object of Chánakya to corroborate the power of Chandragupta by reconciling the former and his party to his sway. Rákshasa, though he professes to feel "his ancient faith and grief for Nanda's race still clinging closely and freshly to his heart," yet finds himself constrained to become "the servant of their foes," and loyally declares—

My only wish is now my sovereign's glory: Long graced by virtue, and beloved by friends, &c.

There is little reason to doubt that the picture of state morals given in this play is substantially a correct delineation of those which existed at the period it was written. Indirect and crooked policy seems to have been the favourite system of government amongst oriental nations in general from very early periods of royal authority. Craft and intrigue are commended by Menu himself as convenient instruments for overcoming a foe. In this play, murder, under certain circumstances, is defined as "prudent policy, not vulgar crime;" and politics are held to be superior to all other considerations:

Those who govern kingdoms must compute of friend, or foe, or neutral, as suggested By principles of state, and not the plens of private feeling, which teach love or hate To ordinary men.—

Wisdom political turns foes to friends, And changes friends to foes; like a new birth, It razes out all memory of past deeds, Which to remember nought advantages, As utterly as if they were, indeed, The long past actions of a former being.

If the play really exhibits, as it probably does, a correct picture of the existing manners, it must be acknowledged that the lasting fidelity and attachment attributed to most of the characters, go a great way to redeem the vices of the system, and afford a very pleasing idea of the private morals of Hindustan.

The two principal characters in this drama are well contrasted:—"Chánakya is violent and inexorable; Rákshasa gentle and relenting; Chánakya's ruling principle is pride of caste; Rákshasa's, attachment to his friends and sovereign; Chánakya revenges wrongs done to himself; Rákshasa, those offered to them he loves; Chánakya with his impetuous passion combines deep design; Rákshasa, notwithstanding his greater temperance, is a bungler in contrivance, and a better soldier than a plotter."

The unity of action is so well preserved in this play, that Mr. Wilson thinks it would be difficult in the whole range of dramatic literature to find a more successful illustration of the rule.

There are few passages in this play which are remarkable. The editor ranks the author considerably below Bhavabhúti and Kálidasa. He displays little imagination, but no want of vigour in his characters or sentiments. The language, though rarely beautiful, is always vigorous, and occasionally splendid.

Some passages, however, are not to be passed over. When Rakshasa revisits the scene of his former greatness and popularity, and contrasts his present with his antecedent state, the following string of comparisons occurs:

This garden too has lost its former splendour; The shattered walls are like a noble race By poverty reduced; the lake is dry, Like a kind heart that pines for luckless friends; As destitute of fruit the trees, as schemes Of policy by fate opposing blighted; And rank grass chokes the fertile soil, like vice And ignorance, the rude uncultured mind. These hoarse resounding murmurs of the dove, Varied alone by the harsh ringing strokes Of the destroying axe, seem to bewail The ruin of these shades, whose naked trees, Leafless and sear, are destined soon to fall, And yield their limbs to feed funereal fires. Here on this marble, fractured as my fortunes, I will sit down and rest.

Descriptions we rarely meet with; the following is from Chandragupta, when he mounts the terrace of his palace:

How beauteous are the skies at this soft season!—Midst fleecy clouds, like scattered isles of sand, Upon whose breast the white heron hovers, flows In dark blue tides, the many channelled stream; And like the pearly blossoms that unfold Their petals to the night, the stars expand.—Below, is Gangá by the autumn led, Fondly impatient, to her ocean Lord, Tossing her waves as with offended pride, And pining fretful at the lengthened way.

The poet has skilfully represented the effect of the sudden stoppage of a cavalcade, when prince Malayaketu is visited by a large party of chiefs, who he desires may halt without.

Jajali. (Speaking as to persons without.)
Princes and Potentates—His highness orders
That none shall follow him; here, halt awhile.—

(To the Prince.)
They have obeyed, Sir, and like ocean's waves,
Pass not the bounds assigned—the steed, short reined,
Curves his proud neck, and paws the passive air,
As if to spurn the skies—the stately elephant
Stops sudden, and the music of his bells
Is on the instant mute.

The Reinávali, or "The Necklace," more nearly approaches the comedy of Europe than any other drama in this collection. The personages are historical, and unconnected with mythology; the incidents are fictitious and entirely of a domestic character. The value attached to this play arises from the view which it affords of Hindu manners in a sphere of life secluded from common observation, and at a period of some antiquity.

The author of the Retnávak was a sovereign prince, Sri Hersha Deva, king of Cashmir, who, it appears from the history of that country by Kalhana Pandit (the concluding portion of which has recently been retrieved), ascended the throne A.D. 1113. The play must, therefore, have been written between that year and A.D. 1125, when his reign terminated.

The subject of the fable is the love of Vatsa, prince of Kausambi, for Retnaválí, otherwise Ságariká, princess of Sinhalá, or Ceylon. A prophecy had declared that whosoever wedded this lady, should become emperor of the world. The minister of King Vatsa, accordingly, solicited her for his. master; but Vikramabáhu, her father, refused his suit on the ground that it might give uneasiness to his niece, the lady to whom Vatsa was already married, namely, queen Vasavadatta. Hearing, however, that the queen was dead, the king of Ceylon despatched his daughter to the court of Vatsa; but the vessel was wrecked on the passage; she escaped, wearing her royal necklace, which forms an incident in the piece. Being taken under the protection of Queen Vasavadatta, the report of whose death was fabricated with the view of deceiving Vikramabáhu, she becomes enamoured of the king, whom, by means of a picture, and of a conversation between herself and a female friend reported to the king by a talking bird, which overheard it, she inspires with a mutual passion. The rest of the play consists of the endeavours of the two lovers to meet, and of the obstacles thrown in their way by the jealousy of the queen, who succeeds in removing Ságariká. By the instrumentality of a magician, who, by the powers of his art, involves in flames the apartment in which the "ocean maid" is confined, from whence, Vatsa rescues her, Vásavadattá is at length mollified, and consents to the union of her husband with the daughter of her uncle, whose history she learned from the ministers despatched from the court of Ceylon. The drama, therefore, ends happily for all parties.

The fable, though of the romantic kind, is pleasing, and with the exception of the magical part, not improbable. The business of the plot is well conducted, and the interest kept up from beginning to end. There is, indeed, little discrimination of character; and the sentiments and language are rather common and level. Mr. Wilson makes the following observations upon this drama:

The Retnávali, considered also under a purely literary point of view, marks a change in the principles of dramatic composition, as well as in those of social organization. Besides the want of passion and the substitution of intrigue, it will be very evident that there is in it no poetic spirit, no gleam of inspiration, scarce even enough to suggest a conceit in the ideas. The only poetry of the play in fact is mechanical. The structure of the original language is eminently elegant, particularly in the Prá-krit; this dialect appears to equal advantage in no other drama, although much more laboured in the Malati Madhava; the Sanscrit style is also very smooth and beautiful without being painfully elaborate. The play is indeed especially interesting on this account, that whilst both in thought and expression there is little fire or genius, a generally correct and delicate taste regulates the composition, and avoids those absurdities which writers of more pretension than judgment, the writers of more recent The Retnávali, in short, may be taken as one of the periods, invariably commit. connecting links between the old and new school, as a not unpleasing production of that middle region, through which Hindu poetry passed from elevation to extravagance

The translator has given the dialogue of this piece in prose, which, he savs. " would have done scant justice to the merits of Kálidas or Bhavabhúti, for with them it would have had to translate lofty imaginings: it is perfectly applicable to the level conceptions of Sri Hersha."

As a specimen of the dialogue, we subjoin part of the opening scene.

THE PALACE OF VATSA. Enter Yaugandharayana.

'Tis true-Fate, if propitious, soon restores the absent, and from remotest islesthe wastes of ocean, and the bounds of earth, safe give them to us again-else how chanced it that the fair daughter of the King of Lanká, whom, as directed by the seer, we had sent to obtain, and who was by her father, with rich gifts, consigned a bride to our illustrious prince, escaped annihilation?-borne on a plank, the relique of her shattered bark, a merchant of Kausámbí found her floating in mid sea. Her costly necklace spoke her of no common rank, whence with all honour she was treated, and to our capital conveyed. Fate still smiled upon our sovereign. I have transferred the maiden to the honourable keeping of the queen; and now I hear our chamberlain Babhravya, and Vasúbhúti, the minister of Sinhalá, who had accompanied the Princess. having by some means reached the shore, are on their way hither, having been encountered by Rumanwan on his march to chastise the King of Kosala. I have little need to fear the end of this-but faithful service ever has its cares-the elevation of my master's power is my aim, and destiny co-operates with my design-neither can the seer prophetic err-the king himself alone I doubt, for still he loves to follow where his own inclinations lead-(a noise behind)-Hark, the mellow drum, accompanied with song and shouts, indicates the clamorous rejoicings of the multitude. I suspect the king has come forth to behold from his palace the frolic merriment with which his subjects celebrate the festival of Kámadeva *- Ah-yes, I see him on the terrace: wearied of tales of war, and seeking most his reputation in his people's hearts, he issues forth attended by his companion Vasantaka, like the flower-armed deity himself, descended to take a part in the happiness of his worshippers. I will retire to my dwelling, and meditate in tranquillity the measures best adapted to ensure us a fortunate termination Exit. of the task we have begun.

(Vatsa Rájá, discovered seated, dressed as for the spring festival, and attended by Vasan-Vats. My friend!

Vas. Your majesty!

Vats. I scarcely can express the content I now enjoy. My kingdom is rid of every

This Vasantotsava, Madhitsava, or Kdmotsava is a festival held on the thirteenth and fourteenth of Chaitra, at which Kdmadeva, the God of Love, was formerly worshipped. The season was one of much merriment, and the genial influence of returning spring was hailed with music and jollity. Part of the amusement consisted in throwing over each other, by means of syringes, water or fine powder, coloured with saffron, or with other yellow or red pinguents, and scented with perfumes. A more elegant missile, commonly used in some places, is rose leaves, large baskets and trays of which are prepared for that purpose. The festival of Kdmadeva holds its place in the kalendar, but its observance is restricted to a few places. In fact it seems to have merged into the Phdigunoteaud or Holi, celebrated a month before, when the like merriment and affusion of coloured powder or water takes place. In the south of India, Kdma is worshipped at this period also, which still further identifies the origin of the festival, although it has undergone some important modifications in date and purpose.

foe, the burthen of my government reposes on able shoulders, the seasons are favourable, and my subjects prosperous and happy. In the daughter of Pradyota, I have a wife whom I adore, and in thee, Vasantaka, a friend in whom I can confide: attended by thee, thus, at such a season, and so disposed, I might fancy myself the deity of desire, and this vernal celebration held in honour of myself.

Vas. Excuse me; since you admit me to be a part of it, I shall even claim the whole, and so highly exalted by your regard, I shall maintain that the festival is mine. Observe the general joy—as if intoxicated with delight, the people dance along the streets, sporting merrily with each other's persons, and mutually scattering the yellow tinted fluid. On every side, the music of the drum, and the buz of frolic crowds fill all the dir. The very atmosphere is of a yellow hue, with clouds of flowery fragrance.

Vats. You lofty mansion opposite to us is occupied by a merry band. I knew not that  $Kaus\acute{a}mbi$  was so wealthy. She outvies the residence of the God of Wealth; her numerous sons are clad in cloth of gold, sprinkled with the fragrant dust of the colour of dawn, or tinted with the saffron dye, decked with glittering ornaments, and tossing their heads proudly with splendid crests, fit for  $K\acute{a}ma$  himself. The soil, plashy with the frequent shower and tread of numerous feet, is converted into vermillion paste, as the artificial bloom is washed down from the cheeks of the maidens, and mingled with the ground.

Vas. See where a coloured shower falls on a thick and struggling crowd, shrinking in vain from the mischievous pipes of those mirthful maids.

Vals. I should compare the city to the subterranean world, where the Snake Gods dwell. The mischievous pipes are crested snakes—the scattering dust, of yellow fragrance, sheds unearthly dimness, and the gleaming tiaras dart through it such radiance, as beams from the serpent jewels.

Vas. Look, Sir, where Madaniká and Chútalatiká approach us—their gestures indicate the influence of the divinity of the season.

Enter Madaniká and Chútalatiká,

Two of the Queen's attendants, dancing and singing.

Mad. Cool from the southern mountains blowing,

Freshly swells the grateful breeze,

Round with lavish bounty throwing,

Fragrance from the waving trees.

To men below and gods above,

The friendly messenger of Love.

Chuta. Lightly from the green stem shaken,

Balmy flowrets scent the skies-

Warm from youthful bosoms waken

Infant passion's ardent sighs-

And first the maiden's heaving breast

Welcomes its delightful guest.

Both. Nor alone the tender blossom

Opens to the smiling day,

Lordly man's expanding bosom,

Buds beneath the genial ray;

Dudy beneath the genutray,

And Love his flowery bow-string strains, And o'er the world resistless reigns.

Vats. I perceive indeed the influence of the season expressed in their appearance; the fillet of the one is loosened, and her long tresses float dishevelled to the air—the neck-lace of the other seems too weighty for her languid frame, though she plies her tink-ling anklets with more than wonted activity.

Vas. I will gird up my garb, and join them, shall I, in compliment to the festival?

Mr. Wilson has appended to this collection of specimens of the Hindu stage, short accounts of other Sanscrit dramas, inferior to those which he has translated, yet not without merit, though a considerable portion of Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149.

4 H them,

them, he says, would have ill-repaid the labour of rendering them into the English language. The particulars he has given of these subordinate pieces include outlines of the plot, and occasionally specimens of the dialogue. We shall close our analysis of the contents of this curious work with Mr. Wilson's account of one of the minor pieces in the appendix, the Kautuka Servanua.

This is also a Prahasana, or farce in two acts, and is especially a satire upon princes who addict themselves to idleness and sensuality, and fail to patronise the Brahmans. The hero is Kalivatsala, or the darling of the age of iniquity; he is sovereign of Dhermanásá, or the destruction of virtue, and he takes as his spiritual guide, Kukermapanchánana, the Siva of iniquity. Satyáchárya, a pious Brahman, returned from Vrindávan, who is treated by the king and his courtiers with great indignity, holds the following conversation with his brethren in jail.

Satya. How now, holy Sirs, how fares it with ye?

Brahmans. We once had lands in free gift.

Satya. What then?

Brahmans. Why, know you not the customs of this country? If the god of wealth owned lands here, that yielded but a grain of corn, the king would send him in three days to beg alms, clad in tatters, and with a platter in his hand. The characteristics of our sovereign are, love of untruth, passion for other men's wives, fondness for the intoxicating juice of Bhang, esteem for the wicked, addiction to vice, and detestation of virtue.

Sauya. You say right. What chance is there for the good? The king is unwise, his associates are wicked, his chief counsellor is a knave, and his minister a scoundrel. Yet the people are many; why is not such misconduct resented?

Brahmans. The manners of the people are equally deprayed; they are valiant in oppression, skilful in falsehood, and persevering only in contempt for the pious, Satya. How are the scribes?

Brahmans. They collect the revenues by any expedient, and vigilantly inflict penalties on the wise. The Brahmans are not allowed to keep even the dust upon their bodies; the dust accumulated on their feet is claimed by the Kayeths. What can we say of this reign? The dumb alone speak truth, the deaf hear the law, the sons of the barren are well behaved, the blind behold the observance of the Scriptures.

Satya. Why do not men of merit quit the country?

Brahmans. Our dwellings have been given to courtesans, our lands to drunkards, and we are detained in prison for what our ancestors expended.

Satya. I have heard enough. It is sinful to hold any communication with the profane. Better fortune attend you!

There is some bitterness in this, and there is also some humour in the piece, especially at the expence of the General Samara Jambúka, the jackall of war, who boasts that he can cleave a roll of butter with his falchion, and is said to tremble from top to toe at the approach of a mosquito. There is also some rather bold censure of the immoralities of the Puranas.

Dhermanala. What says the law? Thou shalt not commit adultery.

Kukerma. The language of fools. So much of the law as the sages and gods themselves observed, be our guide, not such commands as they contemned, like this. Indra deceived the wife of Gautama. Chandra carried off the bride of his Guru. Yama enjoyed the spouse of Pándu in her husband's shape, and Mádhava debauched the wives of all the cow-herds of Vrindávan. Those conceited fools, the Pandüs, imagining themselves sages, alone have made this a sin.

Dherm. But this is the precept of the Rishis. How answer you to that?

Kukerma. They were impostors. Becoming too old to relish pleasure, they condemned it, and out of envy forbade to others what they could no longer enjoy themselves.

All. Very true, very true. We never heard such orthodox doctrine before.

In consequence of this and similar decisions, the king orders vice to be proclaimed virtue by beat of drum, and the piece concludes with the perpetual banishment of all the Brahmans.

There is more humour in this than any of the other farces, and less indecency, although it is not wholly free from the ordinary fault of these attempts at wit. Hindu comedy, however, is not worse than the old councily of the Greeks in this respect, and the indelicacy is attributable in some degree to the constitution of society in both instances, and the exclusion of women from public entertainments.

The Kautuka Servaswa is the composition of a pandit named Gopinath: the date is not known, but it is not likely to be ancient, as it was written for representation at the autumnal festival of the Durgá Pujú, a ceremony peculiar to the province of Bengal, and no doubt, as there practised, of comparatively modern institution.

We are not tempted to overburthen the reader with general reflections upon these interesting specimens of a branch of Hindu composition hitherto so little known. The copious analyses and extracts we have given of the respective pieces, and the brief critical remarks bestowed upon each, will almost put him in a condition to appreciate their merits: and to attempt a laboured comparison between the Hindu and other dramas would be a waste of the reader's time, as well as our own. There is an air of originality about the Hindu drama: all coincidences, whether technical or otherwise, between it and others, are obviously accidental. A people like the Hindus, whose religion, character, manners, and institutions are so peculiar, must discover, in that department of its literature wherein those peculiar properties are visible, broad lines of distinction which would necessarily isolate it.

The dramatic literature of the Hindus will, we think, obtain for them a reputation amongst western nations not yet conceded to their epic and narrative poetry, and may, perhaps, tend to reconcile European students to the cultivation of Sanscrit learning.

It is worthy of remark, that amongst Asiatic poets, there are certain favourite objects, in each country, which are employed in metaphors and similes so frequently that the repetition becomes almost nauseous. Flowers, for example—the Persian poets illustrate their sentiments by incessant allusions to the rose; the Chinese bards pay assiduous court to the peach-blossom; and those of Hindustan are tiresome in their applications of the lotus: in one of the plays before us, Vikrama and Urvass, the lotus is introduced in various comparisons, illustrations, and metaphors, nearly twenty times! It should be observed that this flower is considered to be of two kinds, the one expanding with the rising sun, the other with the moon: it thence supplies a great variety of similitudes. The lotus is, moreover, a sacred plant in the estimation of the Hindus, and is occasionally employed by their writers with special reference to some deity.

We cannot terminate our notice of this edition of Hindu plays without a distinct testimony to the singular merits of the editor, who has displayed his various talents to great advantage. Perhaps no oriental scholar, so profoundly versed in Sanscrit learning as Mr. Wilson, could bring to the task so many other essential qualifications as himself.

OBSERVATIONS ON MR. MILL'S "HISTORY OF BRITISH INDIA." PREFATORY REMARKS.

THE following observations are offered with the view of obviating, in some measure, the serious mischief which Mr. Mill's History of British India is calculated to occasion. No one who has read that extraordinary performance can hesitate to admit, that its tendency is to lower the East-India Company in the eyes of the whole civilized world. Mr. Mill has, indeed, in one or two instances, eulogized the Company in regard to their intentions towards the people of India, but these praises can have no other effect than that of exciting a smile by their outrageous contradiction to the inferences forced upon the reader by the general tenour of the History. In spite of these eulogies, the following are the impressions which the work has an inevitable tendency to produce: - that the Company owe their origin, as a mercantile body, to an odious and impolitic spirit of monopoly; that their existence in that capacity has occasioned, and still occasions, a heavy loss to the nation in a commercial point of view; that in their territorial and political character, most of the measures by which they have acquired the great British empire in the East, are of a nature which is calculated to reflect disgrace upon the British name: whilst in the government of that empire, the whole of their policy, foreign and domestic, displays marks of the grossest injustice, ignorance, and folly, and has now placed the people of India in a worse situation than that in which they were before their subjection to British sway. No reader of Mr. Mill's history will dispute the truth of the character here given of its nature and tendency; and it will moreover be abundantly established by the succeeding extracts.

That the work is adapted to produce extensive mischief is evident from the following considerations. It happens, unfortunately, to be the only general history of British India in existence, and it is read, consequently, by every one who wishes to acquire that political knowledge of our Indian possessions, which no work except a general history is able to convey; and as it displays throughout marks of extensive learning and laborious research, the reader finds a difficulty in believing, that an author who manifests such uncommon industry in the collection of his facts, can err very far in his inferences: the delusion being strengthened by the invariable tone of self-confidence in which all the arguments are delivered. To these causes we must consider it to be owing, that the work, though composed in a style repulsive, and in some parts offensive, has passed through several editions in England, and has already been translated into a foreign language. It would be trifling with the time of the reader to use arguments to prove, that, under these circumstances, the errors contained in this History must produce the worst effects on the public mind in England, in young men going out in the civil or military service of the East-India Company, and likewise in the minds of the natives of the British possessions in the East.

The only efficacious method of counteracting the evils arising from Mr. Mill's work, would be to compile another entire history of British India; but there is reason to think that much good may be effected by pointing out some among the numerous errors he has committed both in his facts and in his reasonings. The exposure of these errors will certainly tend to diminish his general authority as a writer; it will prove him not to be that historical and political oracle which he imagines himself to be, and which, there is reason to believe, he is considered by many others; and in this manner it will counteract much of the mischief, until the appearance of a more just and candid history may entirely supersede the necessity of referring to the pages of Mr. Mill.

That a history of this nature may soon be given to the world is most anxiously to be wished; and the author of the following observations cannot avoid flattering himself, that they may possibly hasten the appearance of so desirable and important an accession to the literature of Britain.

OBSERVATIONS ON BOOK 1st. (From 1527 to 1707.)

In the first book of Mr. Mill's History, the fact most worthy of notice is, that throughout the period it embraces, it represents the East-India Company in the light of a body of men maintaining themselves in the enjoyment of an impolitic and unjust monopoly by unjust and frequently atrocious measures. In his observations on this book, the writer will first endeavour to shew that the character which it affixes to the general conduct of the Company is a gross calumny; and then point out several other errors committed by Mr. Mill both in his facts and reasonings.

Near the commencement of the book it is stated, that the injury sustained by the Company, in the trading license granted by James I. to Sir Edward Michelborne in 1604, was compensated in 1609, "when the facility and indiscretion of King James encouraged the Company to aim at a removal of those restrictions which the more cautious policy of Elizabeth had imposed."* A little farther on they are censured for following the example of all other exclusive companies, in treating "every proposal for a participation in their traffic as a proposal for their ruin."+ In chapter 3d, speaking of the license to trade given by Charles I. in 1634 to Sir William Courten, Mr. Mill tells us that "the inability early and constantly displayed by the Company to sustain even the slightest competition is a sympton of inherent infirmities." In the succceding chapter, the success of the Company in obtaining a renewal of their charter in 1661 is sarcastically ascribed to the "predilection of Charles II. and his ministers for easy rules of government." Shortly afterwards we are told, that "the Company were again threatened (1683) by that competition with their fellow citizens which they have always regarded as their greatest misfortune." Towards the middle of the fifth chapter, they are represented as struggling against "the principles of liberty, now better understood, and actuating more strongly the minds of Englishmen;" and a few pages farther, in relating the application made to the legislature by the association of merchants, which afterwards became the English Company, Mr. Mill thus expresses himself: "The new associators, though thus strong against the particular pleas of their opponents, were debarred the use of those important arguments which bore upon the principle of exclusion; and which, even in that age, were urged with great force against the Company. They, who were themselves endeavouring to obtain a monopoly, could not proclaim the evils which it was the nature of monopoly to produce."**

Whilst Mr. Mill thus speaks of the exclusive privileges possessed by the Company, he represents many of the measures, which they adopted for the preservation of those privileges, as acts of a most criminal nature. It is in this light, especially, that he endeavours to place the following proceedings: the obtaining power from the Crown in 1624 to try their servants in India by martial

[MAY. martial law;* the procuring the powers of admiralty jurisdiction (in 1683) to seize and condemn the ships of interlopers in India;† and the general severity with which they prosecuted all infractions of their chartered rights. t

In order to perceive the extreme injustice of attempting to bring odium on the Company's exclusive privileges, we have to attend to the following considerations:

The Company was instituted for the purpose of carrying on trade with a distant and almost unknown country, and in opposition to the pretensions of Spain, at that time the most powerful empire in Europe, which claimed the right of an exclusive commerce with the East-Indies, and which, by the possession of considerable territories with forts and harbours in different parts of Asia, seemed capable of rendering every attempt by other nations to navigate the Indian ocean an undertaking of no small difficulty and danger. Five years before the establishment of the Company, the Dutch had commenced a trade with the East, and they soon evinced their intention to follow the example of the Portuguese, by occupying harbours and building forts in those parts with which they established an intercourse; and whilst the English were prohibited by the Portuguese from trading with one quarter of India, they soon received a similar prohibition from the Dutch in regard to another.

The general nature of the competition which the Company had to sustain in the East, during the first century of their history, cannot be better shewn than by the following extracts from Mr. Mill's History:

The rivalship between the East-India Company and the other nations of Europe includes, for a considerable time, the principal incidents of their history. The Portuguese, on the pretence of discovery, had long maintained an exclusive claim to the passage by the Cape of Good Hope they had, partly by conquest, partly by agreement, made themselves masters of Goa, Bombay, and other places on the Malabar coast; of Aden, at the entrance of the Red Sea; of Ormus, in the Persian Gulf; of part of the Malay coast, in the Straits of Malacca; of the Molucca islands, and of the coasts of Ceylon, the most valuable of all the Eastern islands; they were possessed of factories in Bengal and in Siam; and they had erected Macao on the coast of China, § At the time when the Dutch commenced their voyages to the East, the crown of Spain was engaged in enterprizes of so much importance in other quarters, and so much engrossed with the contemplation of its splendid empire in the New World, that the acquisitions, in the East-Indies, of the Portuguese, now become its subjects, were treated with comparative neglect. The Dutch, accordingly, who entered upon the trade with India with considerable resources and the utmost ardour, were enabled to supplant the Portuguese in the spice trade, and, after a struggle, to expel them from the Molucca islands. || While the want of funds almost annihilated the operations of the Company's agents in every part of India; and while they complained that the competition of the ships of the merchant adventurers rendered it, as usual, impracticable for them to trade with a profit in the markets of India; the Dutch pursued their advantages against the Portuguese. They had acquired possession of the island of Ceylon, and in the year 1656-57, blockaded the port of Goa; after which they meditated an attack upon the small island of Diu, which commanded the entrance into the harbour of Swally. From the success of these plans they expected a complete command of the navigation on that side of India, and the power of imposing on the English trade duties under which it would be unable to stand.

Such is the view given by Mr. Mill himself of the opposition which the Company experienced from the Portuguese and Dutch; and when we reflect, moreover, on the sanguinary contests in which they were, as a necessary consequence, sequence, frequently engaged with those two nations, we see clearly that the competition to be sustained was no less of a warlike than a mercantile character. It is upon this ground that their claim to exclusive privileges is completely instified. In order to continue their commerce with India, it was necessary for them to obtain, not only the usual gains upon commercial capital, but so much additional profit as to enable them to bear the expence which a state of hostility rendered unavoidable. Their adversaries having acquired territory. and established forts as well as factories in different parts of India, the Comnany, for their own preservation, were forced to follow that example; and all they had to enable them to meet the expense of this necessary course of policy were the profits which an exclusive trade alone could realize. Mr. Mill. indeed, endeavours to point out a way in which Great Britain might have continued her commerce with the East without bestowing exclusive privileges on any particular association. He observes that, "as to warlike competition, a few ships of war, with a few companies of marines, employed by the government. would have yielded far more security than all the efforts which a feeble joint stock could make."* The observation betrays a remarkable ignorance of, or inattention to, this fact-namely, that without forts, harbours, and naval stations, such as had been occupied by the Portuguese and Dutch, a fleet of men-of-war sent to the Indian ocean could have been of little or no service. But, he this as it may, the government, it is certain, did not think proper to take upon itself the protection of the Company's trade in the East. Under those circumstances, therefore, that body were entitled to the exclusive privileges by which alone their commerce could be preserved from destruction.

¶ Page 78. | Page 36. $ See chiefly pp. 88, 111, 112. § Page 35. * Page 52. † Page 102.

We shall now see that Mr. Mill, in endeavouring to stamp an odious character on the Company's monopoly, has not more sinned against justice than in the manner he has thought proper to speak of the principal measures by which they sought to secure the enjoyment of their chartered rights.

Of the petition presented by the Company to the crown in 1624, for power to try their servants abroad by martial law, Mr. Mill speaks in the following severe terms:—"It appears not that any difficulty was experienced in obtaining their request, or that any parliamentary proceeding for transferring unlimited power over the lives and fortunes of the citizens was deemed a necessary ceremony." The first thing, which strikes our attention in reference to this point, is, that throughout the period of eighty-four years comprehended between 1624 and the year with which the first book terminates, no mention is made of a single instance in which this power of martial law was abused. In several cases the power of martial law was exercised, and all these serve to shew the expediency, or rather the necessity, of vesting the Company with the power in question; but not one instance is mentioned of this power being abused. This consideration must alone be sufficient to prove that, on the score of humanity, it was no objectionable measure on the part of the Company to procure the right of exercising martial law.

With regard to the powers of admiralty jurisdiction obtained by the Company in 1683, the language of Mr. Mill is marked with the utmost asperity. "The Company," he observes, "not satisfied with the power which they had already obtained of common and martial law, and of seizing, with their property, and sending to England as many of their countrymen as their interests or caprice might direct, still called for a wider range of authority; and under the favour of government, which they now enjoyed, obtained the powers of admiralty jurisdiction for the purpose of seizing and condemning, safe from the review of the courts of municipal law in England, the ships of the interlopers."* Speaking of the exercise by the Company of these powers of admiralty jurisdiction, Mr. Mill observes, that that body "proceeded, in a spirit of virulence, to extinguish the hated competition of the general traders;" and, he adds, that the "cruelty which marked their proceedings would be hardly credible, if it were less strongly attested." After all this, a reader is prepared to expect a long series of atrocities committed by the Company against the interlopers; but he finds, to his astonishment, that nothing farther is alleged than that they seized and imprisoned, or sent home, a certain number of individuals whose appearance on the Indian ocean of itself violated both the rights of the Company and the laws of England. The most ample justification, however, of the Company's conduct may be found in Mr. Mill's own words. Speaking of the period with which we are engaged, he says:

As the science and art of government were still so imperfect as to be very unequal to the suppression of crime, and robberies and murders were prevalent even in the best regulated countries in Europe; so depredation was committed on the ocean under still less restraint, and pirates abounded, wherever the amount of property at sea afforded an adequate temptation. The fame of Indian riches attracted to the Indian seas adventurers of all nations, some of whom were professed pirates; others, men preferring honest trade, though, when they found themselves debarred from this source of profit by the pretensions and of power monopoly, they had no such aversion to piracy as to reject the only other source of which they were allowed to partake. The moderation which, during some few years, the Company had found it prudent to observe in their operations for restraining the resort of private traders to India, had permitted the increase of the predatory adventurers. As vessels belonging to Mogul subjects fell occasionally into the hands of plunderers of the English nation, the Mogul government, too ignorant and headlong to be guided by any but the rudest appearances, held the Company responsible for the deeds of their countrymen; and sometimes proceeded to such extremities as to confiscate their goods and confine their servants,

Is it not almost incredible that the same person who could write thus should apply the epithet of "cruel" to such measures as the seizing and sending to England individuals whose appearance alone on the Indian ocean amounted to a violation of the rights of the Company, and of the laws of their country? Under any circumstances the Company would have been justified in endeavouring to suppress the contraband trade in question, but most especially when it subjected them to the plunder, confiscation, and other evils, which Mr. Mill describes to have been, in a great measure, the consequence of the resort of the interlopers to the Indian ocean; and in maintaining a contrary opinion, after the facts he himself relates, he is evidently guilty of an inconsistency which may be regarded as astonishing.

With respect to the proceedings of the Company against particular interlopers, Mr. Mill is able to mention only a single case in the first century of their history, in which the justice of their conduct can be considered in the least doubtful; and in this it is nothing more than doubtful. The case is that of Skinner, memorable from the contest to which it gave rise between the two houses of Parliament. The government of Oliver Cromwell had granted permission to private traders to carry on commerce with the East; but this licence was withdrawn in 1657, and in the following year the Company caused the ship and merchandize of Skinner in India to be seized. Skinner averred that he had fitted out his adventure before the licence for private trade was withdrawn; withdrawn; the Company maintained that he had commenced his voyage after the revocation of the license; and to this day it is doubtful which party was in the right; at least the matter is left totally uncertain by Macpherson, the only authority that Mr. Mill has quoted upon the subject. Skinner carried his case at once to the House of Lords: and the Company having appealed to the Commons against the right of the Upper House to take cognizance of a case which did not come before it by appeal from an inferior court, a violent dispute took place between the two branches of the Legislature, in the course of which Skinner was committed to prison by the Commons, whilst the Governor, Deputy Governor, and two other directors of the Company, received the same severe treatment from the Upper House. The dispute reached so great a height, that the King, after adjourning the two houses no less than seven times, finally prevailed on them to erase all the votes and resolutions upon the subject from their journals;* and Skinner received no award of damages against the Company. In the account of this case, while Mr. Mill takes care to relate, very feelingly, that Skinner was committed to prison by the Commons, he omits all mention of the Upper House having exercised the same severity against the principal officers of the Company; + and, in conclusion, although Macpherson, the sole authority he quotes, leaves it a matter of total uncertainty whether Skinner was entitled to any compensation for his losses. Mr. Mill thus expresses himself: +- "A contest, of which both parties (Lords and Commons) were tired, being thus ended, the sacrifice and ruin of an individual appeared, as usual, of little importance. Skinner had no redress." The whole account may be dismissed with the single remark, that it forms a fair specimen of the spirit in which the history appears to have been written throughout.

Having endeavoured to expose the principal fault in Mr. Mill's first book—namely, the calumnious spirit in which it speaks of the Company's exclusive privileges, and of the measures by which they guarded their rights, the writer will briefly notice several other errors which it discovers; beginning with one which partakes of the leading defect just mentioned.

Speaking with the most philosophic coolness of the massacre of Amboyna, Mr. Mill remarks, that although the sufferers in that dreadful atrocity were innocent of the crime imputed to them, there is no reason to think that the Dutch did not feel fully persuaded of their guilt. His ground for this opinion is the impossibility of suspecting that men reared in European society, and professing the Christian religion, should cruelly put to death so many human beings whom they knew to be innocent. It is gratifying to observe a person, possessed of so profound a knowledge of mankind as is displayed in Mr. Mill's writings, reluctant to believe that the massacre of Amboyna was altogether so black an atrocity as is commonly imagined; but on reading a little farther we are sensibly mortified to find that this lenient view of human nature is confined to the Dutch, or at least that it does not extend to the English, since Mr. Mill can believe, on the authority of a single writer, that about the time of the massacre, the English East-India Company " were in the regular habit of perpetrating tortures upon their own countrymen, and even their own servants-of torturing to death by whips or famine!" He considers a sufficient -

See Parl. Hist. ad an. 1670, and Macpherson's Annals, vol. II. p. 493.

† It is possible that Mr. Mill may not have read the account of Skinner's case in the Parliamentary History, which relates the imprisonment of the Company's officers by order of the House of Lords, If so, he has in this instance been guilty of gross negligence.

‡ Page 89. § Page 49, note.
Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149. 4

sufficient proof of such facts as these to be furnished by the sole unsupported authority of Hamilton, an ignorant, illiterate interloper, who lived long after the alleged crimes are alleged to have been committed, and who was prompted by motives of revenge to represent the conduct and character of the Company in the blackest colours. It may be deemed truly marvellous that a writer, who cannot bring himself to believe that the Dutch, without a persuasion of the guilt of their victims, were capable of perpetrating the massacre of Amboyna, should think such slender and doubtful authority sufficient to convict his own countrymen of equal atrocities.

In page 26, Mr. Mill represents an engagement, near Swally, between some of the Company's ships and the Portuguese, to have occurred in 1611, whilst Mr. Bruce, his sole authority, says it took place in the November of the following year; and in the same page he tells us that the phirmaun of Jehanguire, authorizing the first establishment of the English in the peninsula of Hindoostan, was received at Surat in January 1612, although Mr. Bruce, again his sole authority, places that event in 1613.* We are informed in page 35 that Ceylon is the most valuable of all the eastern islands, notwithstanding that its inferiority in value to Java is so well known. In page 48, Holland is carelessly mentioned as being a kingdom at the commencement of the seventeenth century, although it had then, for a considerable length of time, been a republic; and in page 60, it is related that contentions were running high between Charles I. and his parliament in 1635, although in that year no parliament was in being, and none existed between 1629 and 1640. Speaking, in page 79, of the charter for which the Company applied to Oliver Cromwell's government in 1657, Mr. Mill states that it is not ascertained whether it was ever received; whilst Mr. Bruce, in this case also the sole authority that is quoted, asserts positively that it was received.+

These are some of the errors into which Mr. Mill has fallen in so short a space as his first book; and although they are by no means of the same consequence as that capital defect of the history, which consists in the spirit of calumny towards the Company, which it so constantly displays, it is of some importance to point them out, since an exaggerated idea has certainly been formed of the accuracy of this writer with regard to facts. There are many persons, entertaining a very mean opinion of Mr. Mill's reasonings, who are forward to express much admiration of the pains he has employed in the collection of facts; but the errors which have been noticed, together with the many that remain to be pointed out, are sufficient to prove that the accuracy of the historian is by no means so great as is frequently imagined.

* See Bruce's Annals, vol. i. p. 164.

JOURNAL OF A ROUTE THROUGH MYSORE. THE COORG COUNTRY, CANARA, AND MALABAR;

Performed in the course of a Survey, in the Years 1804 and 1805,

BY THE LATE LIEUT. COL. WM. LAMBTON.

MULLAPUNNABETTA is noticed only as being one of my principal stations in carrying on the survey, and whose meridian has been fixed with great accuracy. It is a hill lying about seven miles nurly west from Chenrovpatam, and has a pagoda on the summit, on the platform of which is the station marked by a small mill-stone. Its situation is very favourable for being of use in the survevs of roads, &c., and is in the neighbourhood of many others whose positions have been determined. It lies in latitude 12° 55' 07" N, and longitude from Madras observatory 3° 57' 59" W.

From this hill is seen a great extent of country. There is a full view of the mountains which form the range of western ghauts, of the Bababooden hills, and others in that direction. All this district, and particularly that part of it lying to the north-west, abounds with large fortified villages, the most respectable and populous of any in the Mysoor country. Chenroypatam, Hassen, and Bailoor, are all seen from Mullapunnabetta, and the more distant objects are numerous, the whole extent from the Shevagunga and Saven-droog range to the western ghauts being visible, and contains a vast number of prominent objects well adapted for military surveys. The country from the north, round by the eastward to the south, appears like a vast plain richly cultivated, well supplied with water, and adapted for every kind of military movement. The great road from Chenroyputtum to Monjerabad passes near the foot of the hill.

November 23d.—Left Mullapunnabetta and marched to Kubbetta, about twelve miles to the westward. The road is a by-path the whole way; the country is a little broken and partly cultivated, with plenty of water. The ground admits of strong positions, being defended on every side by hills, and pagodas on the tops of them, with small ridges, tanks, &c., and sufficient space for large encampments. The village of Kubbetta is to the S.E. of the hill, nearly at the foot of it.

November 24th .- Marched to Koondoorbetta, being distant about twelve miles nearly in a W.S.W. direction. The country is much broken, though the road admits of being made good. The features of the country here are altogether different from what we see to the eastward. The hills are covered with a light jungle growing on a beautiful turf, and partly in cultivation. The vallies are flats well supplied with water, and are all luxurious rice grounds. The soil in general is of a darkish sand, and much richer than that to the We crossed the Yeagachewhotty river about half way in the march. This river has its rise among the Bababooden hills, passes Bailoor, and falls into the Hœmawattee, a little way below where we crossed it.

Koondoorbetta takes its name from a village (named Koondoor) a little way to the north-eastward. It is one of my principal stations, and is well adapted with many others laid down in the plan for carrying on military and other surveys.

November 26th.—From Koondoorbetta we marched to Kensama Ooscotta, a large village on the borders of the Bullum district, and on the great road from Chenroypatam to Mangalore. The distance from Koondoor is about eight miles through almost a continued jungle; some parts of the road are very good, good, and other parts broken, though capable of being made practicable. The face of the country is beautifully romantic, the hills are of gentle acclivity, free from underwood, the timber of light growth, of great variety, and the surface of the ground covered with a green turf. The soil is a darkish loam and produces rich crops, particularly in the vallies where cultivation is mostly attended to.

Munjerabad lies about eight miles N.W. from this place; the road crosses the Hæmawattee river, which divides the Bullum country from Mysoor.

We now approach the great range of buntains forming the western ghauts. and which constitute a natural and almost invulnerable barrier towards the sea-coast, overlooking the low countries of Canara and Malabar, which commence at the foot of the mountains. The districts above are Bullum, the Bednore, and the Koorg. The Bullum begins near this, and occupies the great re-entering turn of the range. The Bednore district lies to the north, and continues from Ballaroyn-droog northerly beyond the limits of this survey; to the south is the Koorg, which runs southerly to the Poodicherrum pass, and by a late cession of territory extends below the ghauts almost to the sea-coast. The nature, features, and produce of these three districts nearly resemble each other. Each is formed of high hills and deep vallies, naturally fertile and very populous: the mountains are mostly bare, while the ravines are covered with thick jungle, and in many places ancient forests, inhabited by a variety of wild animals. The duration of the rains, which commence in the middle of May and continue till November, gives rise to a number of large as well as small rivers that flow the whole year, and take different directions. The Cavery has its source in the Koorg, and the Toomboodra among the Bababooden and neighbouring hills. These two great rivers, issuing to the eastward, are obliged by the superior elevation of those high mountains to continue their course in that direction; and the Cavery, after a circuitous route, finds its way to the eastern sea, while the Toomboodra falls to the N.E., and empties itself into the Kistna. The waters which fall to the westward rush down into the lower districts of Canara and Malabar, and form innumerable little rivers which intersect these countries and fall into the sea at a great number of places.

There are two great roads leading through the Bullum to Mangalore; the one generally frequented is that leading down the Bisslee ghaut to the north of the Soobramanee mountain. The other passes by Munjerabad and down the Cissel ghaut. I have not seen either of these passes, but the Bisslee is said not to be difficult, but long.

On the 28th November we left Kensama Ooscotta, and proceeded through the Koorg, which commences about four miles south from Ooscotta on the south bank of the Hæmawatta. At this river we were met by the Rajah's people, and two elephants for our accommodation; we forded the river on these animals, and proceeded thence to Hoodlipett, a village about four miles further south. The ford is not difficult nor the river deep, but the banks are rather steep. From the river to this village is an open country with some breaks, but the road is not bad. The Rajah had directed such strict attention to be paid to us, that not a follower was allowed to pay for an article, and to have declined accepting these marks of hospitality would have caused great mortification, if not offence. I therefore permitted my people to receive every thing gratis.

The village of Hoodlipett had formerly been very extensive, but was nearly destroyed some years ago by the late Tippoo Sultaun; at present it consists of one street and a kucheree.

On

On the 29th we marched southerly to Gondhully, a village near ten miles from Hoodlipett, and over hill and dale the greatest proportion of the way. The first part is open, with some scattered trees and shrubs; the lowest parts; of the vallies are cultivated with rice, the chief grain in the Koorg. The country soon became wild and woody, but the road had been opened for us through a forest hitherto impassable, and is now almost a gun-road with very few serious impediments; the continual succession of hills and vallies present the chief difficulties. We are attended on the march by a large hunting party, consisting of near 200 men, intended to amuse us after we came to our ground: about two hours after our arrival we went out to enjoy the diversion, and in this romantic country it was truly entertaining. The game consists of elk, deer of various kinds, hares, wild hogs, &c., and the huntsmen are divided into two sets, one with sticks, whose business it is to range over the ground and start the game; the other set are provided with matchlocks, and are stationed behind the trees and bushes, arranged in such a manner as to fire in particular directions. These are scattered about, and place themselves near the paths frequented by the animals. During all this time the ranging party' are screaming in all directions, accompanied by the wild notes of the coloryhorn, tom-toms, and occasional firing by the matchlock-men. In this manner the remainder of the morning was passed, while we were seated in trees prepared for us, attending to the diversion of the chase. In these woods are great numbers of wild elephants.

The Koorg, like all mountainous countries, is strong by nature, being full of heights and ravines, with a great proportion of wood-land, and every rising ground would present a new impediment to an invading army; there would be, besides, two rivers to cross, the Hæmawattee and the Cavery. The supplies would be but scanty, for though the soil be very rich, and the country populous, the cultivation is but trifling, the chief food of the inhabitants being the flesh of animals killed in hunting, with a little rice and milk; cattle, however, are in great abundance, and in high condition from the luxuriance of the pasturage; but bazar articles must be had from other quarters. The whole country is well supplied with water in every season of the year. We crossed the great road from Ramnakporum to Soobramanee not far from this village.

On the 30th we continued our march to Somawurpett, about ten miles in a S.W. direction, still attended by our hospitable hunters and our vakeel (Mootanah), whose name is worthy of being mentioned. About half-way we crossed a little rivulet, the boundary between the Saub-huzar talook and that of Somawurpett. Here our huntsmen left us, and were relieved by another set equally attentive to our wants. On our arrival all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were collected in the village to see us; the street was cleanly swept, and the kucherce and two other houses were prepared for our reception. Information had been sent the evening before by Mootanah, and large elks had been procured, which were sufficient for all our followers; to us they were unnecessary, for we had been amply supplied the evening before. Besides the great variety which the forest and rivers afforded us, a shepherd and his flock attended us from our first entering the country. Truly gratifying are such offerings of kindness, where the acceptance seems to produce the only competent return to the hospitable motives from which they flow.

It is remarkable that the inhabitants of these two talooks, who are all united by one principle of obedience and respect to their Rajah, should have a particular distinction in their dress and customs, and this appears on the opposite banks of the brook which marks the boundary. In the Saub-huzar talook the villagers are dressed in a coomly, which passes over the left shoulder, leaving the right one entirely naked, and being wrapped round the lower part of the body as low down as the knee, it is tied round the loins by a kind of sash or belt. In the Somawurpett talook they wear a white vest, covering the whole body down to the knee, and buckled round by a belt; some few, however, of the lowest caste wear the coomly, but they are very few. There is also a marked difference in beating the tom-tom and sounding the colory-horn.

The whole of this march has been through a continued forest, over mountains and vallies, some of which are very steep, and in many places the road is crooked and narrow, but excepting in one spot, there would be no difficulty in preparing it for guns. There are some narrow strips of paddy ground, which draw the wild elephants out of the jungle in the night time, and the inhabitants have places in the trees where they wait the approach of the animals and shoot them: great numbers inhabit the forests through which we passed this day.

December 1st.—Left the direct road which leads to Marakerra, and marched to Kotakul, about eight miles westerly. A considerable part of the road was over the tops and along the sides of the mountains. There had been much rain in the night, which left a thick fog till one o'clock r.m., when it cleared up, and afforded us a distinct view of the country. It appears to be an entire mass of mountains, covered with light wood and a beautiful verdure, on all of which the pasturage is abundant, and affords forage for innumerable herds of cattle. The vallies are narrow winding strips, mostly cultivated with rice, and the lower parts of the declivity of the mountains are thick forests, inhabited by elephants, tigers, bears, clk, and deer of various kinds, such as the antelope, the spotted deer, and another small kind, which the natives call the jungle sheep; besides these there are numbers of monkies, jackalls, foxes, &c. Before we arrived at Kotakul, another party of hunters met us on the road, and attended us to the village at the foot of the hill, where preparations had been made for our reception, and all supplies collected that were necessary.

About three o'clock, the weather being pleasant, we ascended the hill, where we had a distinct view of the ocean. All the range of ghauts to the northward are seen, and appear a vast confused and broken mass of mountains, apparently full of small passes, which the inhabitants say are practicable for men but not for cattle. The Soobramanee mountain lies about five miles west from this hill, and towers high above the rest, being no less than 5,611 feet above the sea. Kotakul or Koondhully being one of my principal stations, I moved up with observatory tent and apparatus on the 2d December. There had been some rain during the preceding night, with heavy wind from the east; towards the evening the atmosphere was pretty clear above the ghauts, but hazy below.

December 3d.—Some trifling rain last night, and a thick fog in the morning; the gale still high from the westward. The evening became very clear, both above and below the ghauts, with some flying showers to the cast: the tops of the hills in the low country are very distinctly seen, and a clear ocean at surset. The nearest part of the shore from this hill is about fifty-four miles.

December 4th.—Heavy wind from the east during last night; this evening clear.

December 5th,—Stormy gale still continues from the eastward: returned down the hill; and next day returned to Somawurpett.

On the 7th we proceeded on our way to Marakerra, where we arrived on the 8th. The country the whole way an entire wood, and the distance from Somawurnett Somawurpett about nineteen miles. The mountains are covered wish thick forests, particularly as we approach the capital. The road during the march on the 7th might be travelled with guns, but the march on the following day was through a rugged country full of narrow and winding defiles, well protected by the jungly heights. Round the capital the hills form an amphitheatre, and the different roads enter through gateways connected by an old line and ditch, extending all along the tops of those ridges.

Our arrival being announced to the Rajah, he returned a message that he would receive our visit about one o'clock; at which hour we attended, accomnanied by Capt. Mahony, the resident, and Colonel Gordon, adjutant-general at Rombay. His palace is within the fort, on one side of an open square. The front apartment, in which he receives his European friends, is furnished in the English style with looking-glasses, pictures, carpets, chairs, &c. He received us with his accustomed cordiality, shook us by the hand, and politely asked us to sit down, taking himself a chair. His first inquiries were to know how we had been accommodated since entering his territory, with a solicitude truly interesting, and which gave us an opportunity of giving a faithful account of the hospitable attention of his subjects, and of impressing on his mind the merits of our friend Mootanah. After some questions on various subjects, he took us through the different apartments of his palace, which is neatly built, particularly the zenana; this he gave us an opportunity of seeing during the absence of the ladics. The remainder of the afternoon was employed in shewing us the various curiosities given him by English officers, and amusing us with his wrestlers, tumblers, fighting rams, &c. In the evening he accompanied us to dinner at the Resident's, and entered into various subjects of conversation and argument.

The fort of Marakerra stands upon rising ground, nearly in the centre of the amphitheatre of hills by which it is encompassed, and is an irregular pentagon, with tower, bastions, and a small work to cover the gateway on the east side, with two bastions similar to the other, now in ruins. The door enters on the north face of the projected work, but at present it is covered by a recent line extending still farther south, and enclosing an area in which is the kucherce. The gateway into this area is from the cast. The whole work is surrounded by a narrow dry ditch, with a double covert way; without that again is an extensive glacis, or rather esplanade of steep descent, and terminates in the hollow in which is a strip of paddy ground extending round the whole, forming another large ditch, but having both its sides accessible, would therefore render it a secure lodgment for an enemy. The Rajah, however, sets little value upon his fort, depending altogether on the natural strength of his country in case of an invasion. During the campaign of 1791, this fort was in possession of Tippoo's forces, the Rajah being then in captivity. When the Bombay army arrived he effected his escape, and was offered assistance to retake his capital: but he refused it, and rested on the confidence he had in his own talents. His plan was to cut off all communication by getting possession of the different avenues by which the supplies would enter, and in a short time the garrison were on the eve of surrendering, when a circumstance happened which would reflect honour upon the heroes of any age or country. At the time the provisions were nearly expended, a convoy was sent by the Sultaun to be thrown into the place, with a considerable force to protect it, commanded by a sirdar who had been the means of the Rajah's escape: knowing that a failure to relieve the distressed garrison would have cost the life of his benefactor, the generous prince suffered the convoy to pass and the escort to return return unmolested. This act of magnanimity, which only prolonged the slege for a few weeks, had its reward in the surrender of the place and the admiration of the English army.

We remained at Marakerra three days, two days of which had been taken up with hunting, shooting, &c. with the Rajah, who is himself a famous marksman. I had proposed moving on the third day (11th), but a very pressing request came down in the evening preceding, that we would not think of marching, as that day was an unlucky one. To satisfy the anxiety of the good man, who perhaps combined a considerable share of hospitality with superstition, I therefore deferred taking our departure till the day following, and in the evening we went to take leave, when we were entertained, as usual, by a display of many curious things, the produce of his own ingenious workmen, in imitation of European manufactures, such as gun-locks, steel chains, &c. fully equal in elegant workmanship to the originals, though of the very best kind. After remaining about an hour, we proposed taking leave, when we were presented with each a handsome shawl, and a war-knife elegantly set in gold. We then took our final departure.

The government of this little community is purely patriarchal, the prince being the father of his people, and in him resides all powers, legislative, executive, and judicial. Few laws must suffice where there are so few wants, but whatever is considered as such is scarcely ever violated. Among those which concern strangers, there is one regulation which ordains that no traveller shall ever be in want while he remains within the Koorg territories, and that if he be poor and needy, he is to be supplied with every necessary gratis; and when he quits that hospitable soil, he is to be furnished with as much money as will procure the needful when he arrives at the next inhabited place. The customs of war have so distorted the human character, that it is difficult to reconcile those discordant and hostile elements which compose it, and this liberal native has his enemies, who accuse him of the most wanton cruclties. But a man capable of dictating such benevolent institutions, and who is himself the immediate example of whatever is beneficent, charitable, and good, cannot surely be a monster in principle.

The nature of the country, and the customs and habits of its inhabitants, conduce to inculcate a martial spirit, and every family being supplied with arms, partly to procure their subsistence and partly to defend themselves against the wild animals, it requires little time to put this country in a state of defence. From what I can learn, 10,000 fighting men could be brought into the field at the shortest notice. The Rajah's household troops being a more regular body, are supplied from different families, where the males take their tour and attend for a certain time. While embodied they are trained to arms, after the English mode of discipline, so that in fact this institution furnishes a nursery for the efficient force of this little kingdom. Previous to Tippoo's reign the fighting men must have been much more formidable, for at the time of the Rajah's captivity, when this district was overrun by the Mysooreans, upwards of 60,000 inhabitants were swept away, many of whom were put to death, others kept in confinement or slavery till the fall of Seringapatam, when they made their escape, and are now with their Rajah.

The household troops have the musket and bayonet the same as the Company's sepoys. The arms used by the rest are the matchlock, the spear, and the war-knife, which is hooked, and the edge turned inward; this they wear on their right hip, uncovered, and ready to take off when they rush upon the enemy. The instrument is broad and heavy, and one stroke with it is sufficient.

cient to sever the head from the body. Small daggers are also worn, which are useful in ambuscades or close attacks. The Rajah's notions of defence are certainly well adapted to such a country. Despising the system of being cooped up within a fort, which must ultimately become the point of general attack, his principle is to possess the avenues and defiles, to lay in ambush, to harrass and cut off the enemy's convoys, and to seize every opportunity of surprising him, but to avoid open action unless there be a manifest advantage. Had the late sultaun pursued such a system, the English army never could have reached the table-land of Mysore.

On inquiring respecting the manufactures, I find they are but few. Their arms are all made in the country, and the coomlies worn by the lower order of neople; but the white cloth of which the vests are made is brought from Cannanore and Tellicherry, and their returns consist of rice, sandal-wood, pepper, &c.; honey is also in great abundance. The salt used in the country is brought from Malabar or Canara, but I should rather think can be made within that part of Koorg lying below the ghauts. That district lies on the great road from Marakerra to Mangalore, and the ghaut down which that road leads, and which we followed, is called the Yellaneer pass. It commences about nine miles north-westerly from Marakerra, and is a steep descent with little variation to the bottom, being a distance of about three miles. It is in general good, and scarcely at all affected by the rains; the composition of which the mountain is formed being a mixture of clay and loam, becomes hard when exposed to the air: a very little repairing would make this ghaut very practicable for any thing but guns and carriages, and even these might pass with the assistance of men and elephants. Kuddamakul, to which we came in one march from Marakerra, is about eighteen miles distant, and near three miles from the bottom of the ghaut.

On the 13th December we marched from Kuddamakul to Chokady; the distance is about fifteen miles westerly: the first part of the road is very good, but the whole distance is through an entire juugle.

On the 14th marched from Chôkady to Bellarie, about eight miles, still westerly, the road through an entire jungle, and over ascents and descents as

On the 15th, from Bellarie to Pôtoor, distance about twelve miles westerly, the road in general good, and the country more open. The jungles are full of the pepper vine, and the features of this low land are beautifully variegated with small verdant hills, rivulets, ravines, &c.

I was detained at two stations, Bullanandgooda and Bullamullee, from which the country is seen at a great distance. On the 23d marched from Potoor to Mangalore. The road crosses the Buntwanl river at Buntwanl, and continues along the northern bank the remainder of the way. The face of the country is much broken, full of barren hills, round which the vallies wind like the beds of rivers, quite flat, and richly cultivated with rice. These windings have every appearance of having been made by an ingress of the sca, and the hills are all formed of that composition formerly mentioned, which is now become an entire rock, quite naked near the sea, but covered with lofty forest trees towards the great range of ghauts. This composition is excellent for roads, as they are easily made with it, in the manner of pavements, and will continue years without repairs; it is likewise excellent for fortification, for though hard it is not brittle, and therefore not subject to splinters; it is likewise used in building houses, and all the villages along the coast are built with it, and have a neat appearance.

Mangalore is a place of great population, containing at present nearly 12,000 inhabitants of different nations, and although it is not remarkable for any manufactures, it is a considerable mart for various kinds of merchandize conveved thither both by land and sea. The harbour is only suited for small craft, and this is within a bar which continually changes its entrance; this bar is a continuation of the breach through which the river and the sea have formed a communication, and within which there is a large basin, running un a considerable distance to the northward, and is completely land-locked, but the water is only a few feet deep when the tide is out. The late Tippoo Sultaun had a marine yard near the mouth of the river; and in the year 1782. when the English took Mangalore, there were two large ships then on the stocks, pierced for sixty guns, but these vessels were flat-bottomed. The common craft is the doni, a beautifully modelled vessel, rigged with two masts and lug sails, and the planks of which it is built are sewed together, and painted over. They draw very little water, and are calculated either for running in shore or standing out to sea.

The justly celebrated defence of this place in 1782 is recorded among the transactions of those days, and is one of the most brilliant events that ever graced the military annals of any country. The garrison, commanded by Lieut, Col. Campbell, consisted of 3,550 men, 696 of whom were Europeans, including ninety-one officers. The whole of the sultaun's force amounted to 140,000 fighting men. The fort, which has since been blown up, was then a square stone work, with a cavalicr bastion at each angle. On the side next the water, as well as on that next the land, to the eastward, there appears to have been an advanced work similar to a horn-work, and the whole circumscribed by a deep ditch, across which, on the east side, has been the entrance into the work; a covert way and regular sloped glacis has covered the whole on the three sides next the land, a lower glacis has served next the sea, whose slope comes nearly to the water, terminating in a quay where the donies now land their cargoes, and the glacis may be said to be separated from the quay by a row of coco-nut trees, leaving sufficient room for the purpose intended. Without the ditch, on the S.E. angle, there has been a small redoubt, which was defended during the siege, while Tippoo's forces had possession of the N.E. part of the horn-work.

About three-quarters of a mile N.E. from the fort, where the eedgal now stands, is a crescent of table-land, considerably clevated above the fort. This crescent is curved towards the east, and a line of works, with five cavalier bastions, all included within a ditch, have been creeted, the whole forming an advanced intrenchment to act against an enemy from the land. This position, as far as I can understand, was taken by a part of the troops forming the garrison, but being too extensive to defend, and commanded by the ground to the eastward possessed by the enemy, it was thought advisable to relinquish it and retire into the fort, giving place to Tippoo's forces, who now began the more immediate operations of the siege. Taking post on this commanding ground, their approaches were carried on towards the N.E. angle of the hornwork, covered by a high cavalier at the S.W. extremity of the crescent and nearest the fort, aided by the fire from this cavalier, they soon brought their advanced works to the glacis, got possession of the horn-work, and breached the body of the place.

The circumstances of this siege now became truly interesting on both sides: the brave garrison, pent up in a fort without bomb proofs and without provisions, had suffered every calamity that the human mind can conceive; though reduced to a few, and that few feeding on their dogs and horses, and seeing at last a breach effected, and a numerous army moving on to the assault, they were not dismayed either by superior numbers or the hopeless prospect of retreat. Often did the enemy advance to the breach, and as often were they repulsed, till, wearied out with fruitless attempts and galled by the fire from the redoubt at the S.E. angle, they at length retreated, leaving this gallant band to contemplate their own glory, and the happy result of their exertions. But their miseries did not end here, for notwithstanding a cessation of arms, which had just taken place between the English, French, and Mysoreans, the place continued to be blockaded by Tippoo's army, and the garrison for several months felt the increasing hardship of famine, till at last the brave commandant received orders from the Madras government to propose terms of capitulation, when it being agreed on that some fort in the Carnatic should be given up in place of this one, they marched out with the honours of war, and soon after embarked for Tellicherry.

This place never can grow to great importance, in a military point of view, on account of the extent of ground which it would be necessary to occupy against a land attack; but might be defended against any force by sea, unless that force was favoured by the inhabitants of the country, and suffered to run up some of the neighbouring rivers, and advance from the eastward, but, the interior country would present innumerable impediments to an invading enemy.

December 28th I left Mangalore to proceed down the sea-coast, with a view to fix the positions of some remarkable places, and to carry down a series of triangles as far as Cannanore, that may serve hereafter as a foundation for a more minute survey of that coast, at present but very imperfectly known. I marched this day to Munjeserah, about ten miles to the south of Mangalore. We crossed the river in a large vehicle formed by three small donies, covered by a platform for conveying horses and cattle. The road runs nearly along the beach the whole way. There is nothing remarkable along the coast except a few projecting or elevated points, on which are the ruins of redoubts.

On the following day continued our march to Coomlah, near ten miles further down the coast. There are two rivers to cross towards the end of the march, between which the fort of Coomlah stands, upon rising ground. I had not time to examine it minutely, but it is a rectangular work, with a large gateway on the north, and there is a high cavalier within the fort, and an advanced rectangular line towards the sea, communicating with the fort on the west side. The whole is defended with circular bastions and a dry ditch. The road runs along the beach nearly the whole way, and these rivers are pretty broad at high water.

(To be concluded next month.)

( 612 ) [MAY,

THE RAMA LEELA.

The dramatic representation of the history of Rama, the seventh avatar of Vishnu, is well known to constitute one of the principal festivals in the Hindu calendar. It occupies, in Upper Hindustan, the place and the season of the Doorga Pooja, which is celebrated with so much splendour and circumstance throughout Bengal. It commences the new year, and coincides nearly with the autumnal equinox. It has also, like the Doorga Pooja, a duration of fifteen days, which Bentley has supposed, with respect to the latter feast, to have originated in a correction of the calendar, after the equinox had been found to deviate fifteen days from the civil epoch.

However, the celebration of the Ram Lecla does not, like the Doorga Pooja, pretend to any great antiquity. Tulsee Das, the author of the Bhakha version of the Ramayana, lived in the immediate neighbourhood of Benares, and composed his poem in A.D. 1574. From the circumstance of his having given this work a popular shape and language, it is probable that the custom of reading it in the Sanskrit had been, before his time, prevalent. But the poem is not written for dramatic performance, and there is no trace of the representation having been in practice earlier than a century and a half ago in the city of Benares.

Five or six different spots in the town become annually, at this season, the scene of a Ram Lecla. In most of them the exhibition is curtailed and imperfect: in some it is little better than a bonfire of Rawun's gigantic image on the day of the Dusera. Many of the native regiments go to considerable expence in performing the Ram Lecla: but the Raja of Benarcs, on his estate at Ramnugur, conducts the performance in a very complete manner; nearly the whole of the Ramayana is read through in the course of twenty or thirty days, and whatever incidents are capable of being acted or displayed, are simultaneously exhibited.

The whole of the acting is necessarily in dumb show, and the dramatis personal are so numerous, and in general so unskilled in their duty, that the leaders, who may be said to act the part of the stage managers, have great difficulty in making the performance keep pace with the oral declamation of the choir, or band of priests, who chaunt the sacred legend. The scenery is, as far as it can be, real; for instance, wherever the Ganges or the sea is required, the scene is shifted to the bank of some tulae; such incidents as are adapted to the night are performed by torch-light. Separate gardens receive the designations of Ayodhya, Junukpoor, Chitrakot, and Kiskindha, which are the principal localities of the poem.

For Lunka, Rawun's capital, an artificial fort is constructed of earth and paper, painted yellow, to imitate gold, and in the centre of it a huge figure of Rawun is erected, sixty or seventy feet high, which is generally filled with fireworks and combustibles. The chief action of the piece is carried on within an arena enclosed with bamboo rails, in the middle of an extensive plain, which is crowded, especially towards the conclusion of the Leela, with an innuense assemblage of all classes of Hindus.

Of the dramatis personæ little remains to be observed: in acting they are mere puppets, but their dresses and masks are very appropriate. Rama, Sita, and the brothers, are enacted by children richly decorated, and with their faces merely painted; their inauguration, indeed, bears something of a religious character. Offerings and pooja are made to the diadem which is to be worn by Rama, and to the child who personifies this deity throughout the festival. The boys go through the ceremony with a dignity, gravity, and patience which is surprising. On one occasion, however, the illusion was awfully disturbed by a handful of rupees, which the raja threw among them, when they fell to scrambling like schoolboys for cakes, or like the immortals for ambrosia. Rawun, Hunooman, &c. are personified by men in masks, and the Rakshassa and giants are constructed of paper and basket work, with arms portentous and of frightful mien. Rocks, birds, and other paraphernalia, are managed nearly as well as in our pantomimes, and in one place where Ram restores to life the wife of Gotuma Rishi, who had been changed into a rock, we behold the prototype of our trap doors,—a hole in the ground, from which a woman emerges.

At Ramnugur, the Leela opens with the Balkand, in which is described the preliminary history of Rawun and his brothers; the boon granted by Bruhma (who appears riding upon his goose) that he should only die by human hands; his marriage; his insults to gods and Brahmuns; and a solemn night procession of the earth in the form of a cow, attended by all the dectas, to invoke Vishnu, who sleeps upon his serpent on the surface of a tank.

The circumstances of Rama's birth and childhood are then represented. His visit to Viswamitra, and to Raja Junuk, where his marriage takes place, are the most pleasing parts of the drama. At the dawn of day Ram seeks the garden of Junuk for the purpose of bathing and gathering flowers; at a distance he beholds the lovely Sita in the midst of her maidens, repairing to the temple of Debce, where she breathes the very natural prayer that the hero she has just seen may become her husband. Ram returns to Viswamitra, distracted with love, and in the evening he mistakes the moon for his Sita, but is undeceived by her liability to change.

The grand assembly of chiefs and princely suitors on the following day in Junuk's palace is worthy of the pen of the author of Ivanhoc. The sensation caused by the beauty of Ram; the jester who describes to Sita the qualities of all her suitors; their unavailing efforts to string the fated bow; the modesty of Ram in needing persuasion before he attempts it; the crash of music which bursts forth at his success, and the blushing Sita investing him with the garland of victory and love, are incidents as well suited to dramatic representation as to poetry.

In the city of Benares the Balkand is omitted, and the drama commences with the resignation of the throne by Raja Dasarath in favour of Bhurut, and the banishment of Ram to the jungle fourteen years, in completion of a vow. The first scene is laid in Soondur Das's garden, south of the Mundakinee Talao, whence the procession passes the streets to Iswur Gungee Talao and Chitrakot. It may in general be remarked that the processions and battles are more particularly suited to public exhibition in a town, while the reading and detail of the drama are conducted before a limited audience in the gardens of different merchants and Brahmuns, who unite in the conduct of the entertainment. Two or three days are expended at Chitrakot, in perusing the Ayodhyakand, and in representing, dramatically, the news of Dusarath's death, Bhurut's entreaties that Ram should return the visits of Goha, the forester, Junuk, several munis, and in particular of Valmiki, the reputed author of the original Ramayana.

The action of the piece becomes more animated after the conclusion of the Ayodhyakand. Day after day some conflict with a Rakshas, or giant, takes place in some customary spot: thus the "Dhoolia Rakshas" combat is exhibited near Ram Chund's garden, and the Khuradooshun Lurace at Trilochun. The latter being within the town, assumes again the form of a procession of Rakshases, the followers of Soorpunukha, the sister of Rawun, who vows vengeance because neither Ram nor Luchmun appreciates her charms. Any body may join the masked procession, and this year there were seen a number of jacketed sahibs in white-faced masks, whether intended as appropriate allies to Rawun's hosts of demons, or merely as a specimen of masquerade, I will not presume to determine. Something of the kind is occasionally seen in the Doorga processions in Calcutta. The whole host are speedily destroyed by Ram.

Rawun's device for carrying off Sita is next represented, the stag-shaped Marich attracts away Ram and Luchmun, while Rawun, as a fuquer, entices Sita from the magic circle drawn round her for her preservation. Another long-handed Rakshas is also slain, and a vulture, or non-descript bird. Ram, in despair at the loss of his bride, hurries forward to Kiskindha, where he forms an alliance with Sugriva, a monkey-chief, and aids him in warring with his brother Bali. It is here that Hunooman first makes his appearance upon the stage, where he afterwards sustains the principal interest during his search for and interview with Sita in Lunka; his setting that city on fire with his tail, his return with a pledge of constancy from the heroine, his destroying Sugriva's garden, and finally, with his army of monkeys, constructing a bridge of rocks across the sea, and personally combating with Rawun.

The last battle, in which Rawun is killed, occurs on the Dusera, or tenth day. This is, at Ramnugur, the principal day of the spectacle, which is well worth seeing. In the evening the Raja of Benares, in full procession, issues from his palace gate under a discharge of artillery; his state elephants are preceded by banners, music, equipages, and soldiery, extending as far as the eye can reach. On the way the Raja stops to make the customary offerings of flowers, rice, and a coco-nut to a sumee tree, for prosperity during the approaching season. When his splendid train arrives on the plain, the elephants seem to be swimming in an ocean of heads, and their rich caparisons add greatly to the brilliance of the scene. To the right and left are observed the camps of the adverse chiefs; the fort of Lunka is farther behind, with giants guarding the gates: directly in front, upon the pavilion, or booruj, of a garden, sits little Sita, guarded by frightful Rakshases. The performers and orchestra are within an enclosure in the centre; Ram and Rawun, conspicuous on their lofty chariots, discharging arrows at one another, while their bands of Hunoomans, multiplied Rawuns, and little sprites with torches, are engaged in unequal fight below. The gods, from the summit of two scaffolds, occasionally applaud in chorus, and are occasionally, too, driven from heaven by Rawun. When at last Rawun falls, the whole multitude clap their hands and shout, and the day concludes with the discharge of fireworks from Lunka, and the explosion of the gigantic figure in the middle.

On the following afternoon another spectacle occurs of an equally or even more interesting nature. It is entitled the Bhurut Melao, or the return of Ram and Luchmun with Sita to Ayodhya. All the brothers and their chief allies are carried in procession through the town upon a large throne, something similar to that used in an English election. Altogether, the immense crowd, the variety and brightness of the costume, the valuable ornaments and beauty of the children, the cheerfulness and unmoblike demeanour of the people as they shower down flowers and chaplets upon the sacred groupe, with the picturesque enhancement of a clear evening sky, and the intermixture of garden foliage, complete a picture to which no description can do instice, justice, and which will be best rendered intelligible to an English imagination under the title of a genuine Oriental pageant.*

* Calcutta Gov. Gazette, Nov. 1.

THE FALL OF SEVILLE.

From the Arabic of Aboulbeca Salch.

As lovers weep, when from their dearest hopes Exiled by fate they pine; so we, alas! Weep for unhappy Seville, weep her loss, Descried, prey of unbelieving dogs; Her mosques to churches turned, whilst cross and bell Usurp the place of the tall minaret. A woe like this absorbs all other woes: Time cannot lenify its pangs, nor quench The bitter recollection. Seville's gone !-O ye, who mount the slim and fiery steed, And with an eagle's swiftness scour the fields Where purple slaughter reigns; O ye, who wield Falchions of Indian steel that in the dense And pitchy clouds of dust like lightning gleam; O ye who, far from this devoted spot, Beyond the rolling sea, calm and serene Pass easy days and tranquil nights: O ve Whom glory and power attend as harbingers; Say, have you known the miseries of Spain? Sure some poor wretch has 'scaped to tell the tale, 'Scaped to proclaim that Arab blood still calls For vengeance, we for succour. Yet we sink, Or swell the victor's train. Is there not one Dare aid us? Does sectarian zeal restrain The courage of the Moslems? Shame on such! Are we not brothers? To the self-same God Do we not offer yows? Without poor Spain None can be found, generous and brave and bold; Religion's pleading voice no Moslem heeds. The Arab sons of Spain, who, erst elate In grandeur and in glory, reared their crests, Hide them in grief and shame. But yesterday, Princes and kings; now unbelievers' slaves! Alas! could the degrading mart be seen By unthralled Moslem eyes, and the salt tears That furrow many a manly check, which shame Not fear, had blanched; could Musulmans see this, Sorrow would bring on madness. Yet, once more ;--Behold those tender maids, fair as the sun That rising flings rubies and coralines From his bright throne, dragged by barbarian hands Rudely along to service worse than death; Whilst wringing hands and melting eyes declare The sufferers' anguish. Surely if there be One spark of faith, one spark of courage, left Within your souls, they cannot still be cold.

STATE OF EDUCATION IN SOUTHERN INDIA.

In our last volume, p. 584, is inserted a sketch of the state of education amongst the natives of Bangalore, by Ram Raz, the native secretary of the Madras School Book Society. We have been since favoured with an authentic report of the state of native education in the province of Bellary, a territory acquired by treaty from the Nizam in the year 1800, and under the presidency of Fort St. George.

The population of Bellary, according to an official statement, consists of 927,857 souls; the number of schools in the province is 533, containing 6,641 scholars only, bearing a proportion of about 7 to 1,000 of the aggregate population. O the scholars, who are males, with the exception of 60 Hindoo girls, only 24: are Musulmans; the rest are Hindoos. The English language is taught in but one school; the Tamul in four; the Persian in twenty-one; the Mahratta in twenty-three; the Teloogoo in two hundred and twenty-six; the Carnatica in two hundred and thirty-five.

Besides the aforegoing, there are twenty-three places of instruction attended by Brannins exclusively, in which some of the Hindoo sciences, such as theology, astronomy, logic, and law, are imperfectly taught in the Sanscrit language. In these last places, which are attended not merely by youth, but by persons advanced in life, education is conducted on a plan entirely different from that pursued in the Hindoo schools, where children are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic only, in the several vernacular dialects of the country.

The education of the Hindoo youth generally commences when they are five years old; on reaching this age, the master and scholars of the schools to which the boy is to be sent, are invited to the house of his parents. The whole are seated in a circle round an image of Gunasa, and the child to be initiated is placed exactly opposite to it. The schoolmaster, sitting by his side, after having burnt incense and presented offerings, causes the child to repeat a prayer to Gunasa entreating wisdom. He then guides the child to write with its finger in rice the mystic name of the deity, and is dismissed with a present from the parents, according to their ability. The child next morning commences the great work of his education.

Some children continue at school only a few years, the parents, through poverty or other circumstances, being often obliged to take them away, and consequently, in such cases, the mercet smattering of an education is obtained; but in other instances, where the parents are opulent, and take a lively interest in the culture of their children's minds, they not unfrequently continue at school as long as fourteen or fifteen years.

The internal routine of duty for each day, with very few exceptions and little variation, is the same in all schools. The general hour for opening school is six o'clock. The first child who enters has the name of Saraswatce, or the goddess of learning, written upon the palm of his hand, as a sign of honour; on the hand of the second, a cypher is written, to shew that he is worthy neither of praise nor censure; the third scholar receives a gentle stripe, the fourth two, and every succeeding scholar that comes an additional one. This custom, as well as the punishments in native schools, seem of a severe kind. The idle scholar is flogged, and often suspended by both hands and a pully to the roof, or obliged to kneel down and rise incessantly, which is a most painful mode of punishment.

When the whole are assembled, the scholars, according to their numbers and attainments, are divided into several classes; the lower ones of which are nlaced placed partly under the care of monitors, whilst the higher ones are more immediately under the superintendance of the master, who at the same time has his eye upon the whole school. The number of classes is generally four, and a scholar rises from one to the other according to his capacity and progress. The first business of a child on entering school is to obtain a knowledge of the letters, which he learns by writing them with his finger on the ground in sand, and not by pronouncing the alphabet, as among European nations. When he becomes pretty dexterous in this mode of writing, he has then the nrivilege of writing either with an iron style on cudjan leaves, or with a reed on paper, and sometimes on the leaves of the aristolochia Indica, or with a kind of pencil on the kulligi or keedeta, which answer the purpose of slates. The two latter are the most common in these districts: one is a common oblong board, about a foot in width and three feet in length, planed smooth, and smeared with a little rice and pulverized charcoal. The other is made of cloth first stiffened with rice water, doubled into folds, resembling a book, and then covered with a composition of charcoal and gum. The writing on either of these may be effaced by a wet cloth. The pencil used is called bullapa, a kind of white clay, somewhat resembling a crayon, but rather harder.

Having attained a thorough knowledge of the letters, the scholar next learns to write the compounds, or the manner of embodying the symbols of the vowels in the consonants, and the formation of syllables, &c.; then the names of men, villages, animals, &c.; and, finally, arithmetical signs. He then commits to memory an addition table, and counts from one to a hundred; he afterwards writes easy sums in addition and subtraction, of money, multiplication, and the reduction of money measures, &c. Here great pains are taken with the scholar in teaching him the fractions of an integer, which descend not by tens, as in our decimal fractions, but by fours, and are carried to a great extent. In order that these fractions, together with the arithmetical tables in addition and multiplication, and those in the threefold measures of capacity, weight and extent, may be rendered quite familiar to the minds of the scholars, they are made to stand up twice a day in rows, and repeat the whole after one of the monitors.

The other parts of a native education consist in decyphering various kinds of hand-writing in public and other letters, which the schoolmaster collects from different sources; writing common letters; drawing up forms of agreement; reading fables and legendary tales; and committing various kinds of poetry to memory, chiefly with a view to obtain distinctness and clearness in pronunciation, together with readiness and correctness in reading any kind of composition.

The three books which are most common in all the schools, and which are used indiscriminately by the several castes, are the Ramaya: A Maha-Bharata, and Bhagavata; but the children of the manufacturing class of people have, in addition to the above, books peculiar to their own religious tenets, which being considered sacred, are studied with a view of subserving their several creeds.

The lighter kinds of stories, which are read for amusement, are generally the Punchatuntra, Bahatala Punchavunsatee, Punktee Soopooklahully, and Mahunta Rungever. The books on the principles of the vernacular languages themselves are the several dictionaries and grammars; but these books, without which no accurate or extensive knowledge of the vernacular languages can be attained, are from the high price of manuscripts, and the general poverty of the masters, of all books the most uncommon in the native schools, and such of Aiat. Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149. 4 L them them as are found there are, in consequence of the ignorance, carelessness, and indolence of copyists in general, full of blunders, and in every way imperfect.

The whole of the books, however, in the Teloogoo and Carnatica schools. which are by far the most numerous in this district, whether they treat of religion, amusement, or the principles of these languages, are in verse, and in a dialect quite distinct from that of conversation and business. The alphabets of the two dialects are the same, and he who reads the one can read, but not understand, the other also. The natives, therefore, read these (to them unintelligible) books to acquire the power of reading letters in the common dialect of business; but the poetical is quite distinct from the prose dialect, which they speak and write; and though they read these books, it is to the pronunciation of the syllables, not to the meaning or construction of the words, that they attend. Indeed, few teachers can explain, and still fewer scholars understand, the purport of the numerous books which they thus learn to repeat from memory: every schoolboy can repeat, verbatim, a vast number of verses, of the meaning of which he knows no more than the parrot that has been taught to utter certain words. Accordingly, from studies, in which he has spent many a day of laborious but fruitless toil, the native scholar gains no improvement except the exercise of memory, and the power to read and write on the common business of life: he makes no addition to his stock of useful knowledge, and acquires no moral impressions. He has spent his youth in reading syllables, not words, and on entering into life, he meets with hundreds and thousands of words, in the common course of reading books. of the meaning of which he can form not even the most distant conjecture; and as to the declension of a noun, or the conjugation of a verb, he knows no more than of the most abstruse problem in Euclid. It is not to be wondered at, with such an imperfect education, that in writing a common letter to their friends, orthographical errors, and other violations of grammar, occur in almost every line written by a native.

The economy with which children are taught to write in the native schools, and the system by which the more advanced scholars are caused to teach the less advanced, and at the same time to confirm their own knowledge, is certainly admirable, and well deserves the imitation it has received in England. The chief defects in the native schools are the nature of the books and learning taught, and the want of competent masters.

Imperfect, however, as the present education of the native is, there are few who possess the means to command it for their children. Even were books of a proper kind plentiful, and the master every way adequate to the task of instruction, he would make no advance from one class to another except as he might be paid for his labour. While learning the first rudiments it is common for the scholar to pay the teacher a quarter of a rupee, and when arrived as far as to write on paper, or at the higher branches of arithmetic, half-a-rupee per mensem. But in proceeding farther, such as explaining books, which are all written in verse, giving the meaning of Sanscrit words, and illustrating the principles of the vernacular languages, such demands are made as exceed the means of most parents. There is, therefore, no alternative but that of leaving their children only partially instructed, and consequently ignorant of the most essential and useful parts of a liberal education; but there are multitudes who cannot avail themselves of the advantages even of this, the necessities of the greater part of the middling and lower classes of the people requiring the assistance of their children as soon as their tender limbs are capable of the smallest labour. Such Such is the state in this district of the various schools in which reading, writing, and arithmetic are taught in the vernacular dialects of the country, as has been always usual in India, by teachers who are paid by their scholars. The higher branches of learning, on the contrary, have always in this country been taught in Sanscrit, and it has ever in India been deemed below the dignity of science for her professors to barter it for hire. Lessons in theology, astronomy, logic, and law, continue to be given gratuitously, as of old, by a few learned Bramins to some of their disciples.

The writer of the statement from whence we have borrowed these particulars, concludes it with some reflections upon the retrogression of education amongst the natives of this part of India at the period he was writing, namely 1823, and with some very judicious suggestions for promoting the great object of instruction, which, he observes, the enactments of the British Parliament contemplate, and the known liberality of the authorities in England with regard to this point encourages. He ascribes the falling off in respect to education amongst the natives to a variety of causes, chiefly to the impoverishment of the country, through the great deterioration of the manufacturing classes of late years, by the introduction of our own European cotton fabrics in lieu of those of India, the diminution of the number of troops in the British territories, which has affected the demand for grain, &c. Consequently, in many villages, schools had ceased to exist; in others the number and size of the schools decreased, only a few of the children of the most opulent natives being able to pay the necessary expense of instruction.

Heretofore the ruling authority in India contributed largely to the support of education, and under the Hindoo governments, large grants, in money and land, were assigned for the promotion of science. Stipends of money still paid to Bramins from the British collectorships, and numerous and valuable shotriums, or landed property, now in the possession of Bramins, who receive one-fourth, one-third, half, two-thirds, and sometimes the whole of the annual revenue, are probably to be traced to some endowment of this nature, being almost universally granted to learned or religious persons, who maintained a school for one or more of the sciences, and taught therein gratuitously. Although the duty of continuing such gratuitous instruction was not expressed in the deed, it was doubtless implied. The British government, with its accustomed liberality, continued all grants of this kind, even where they were evidently of a personal nature, though without enforcing the implied conditions. The revenue of the original grantee descended to his heirs; but his talents and acquirements not being equally hereditary, the descendants were rarely found to possess the requisite ability to give instruction. Accordingly, considerable alienations of revenue, originally appropriated to the encouragement of learning, have become the means of supporting ignorance; and science, which here scorns to sell its treasures, has often been reduced to dependence upon the precarious benevolence of charitable Of the 533 institutions for education subsisting in this district, not one received any support from the state at the period when this statement was drawn up.

The writer suggests that the government should undertake the office of originating and superintending establishments for ameliorating the system of instructing the natives, and should endeavour to induce the opulent classes of the native community to contribute to the support of schools. The first expense, he observes, must necessarily be borne by government; but in process of time, and in order to provide for the extension of the schools, on the demise demise of the present occupants of the alienated lands, an inquiry into the titles might be instituted, in order that in cases where the uses to which they were appropriated had not been fulfilled, or where the property was expressly described in the original grant as hereditary, they might be resumed by the government, and carried to a "school fund," the receipts of which, he is of opinion, in a few years, would more than counterbalance the disbursements.

It is due to the Madras government to state, that prior to the date of this statement, namely in the year 1822, the late Sir Thomas Munro had set on foot an extensive inquiry on this subject throughout the districts subject to the presidency, with a view of effecting reform and amelioration in the system of native education. It is still further creditable to that lamented individual, that in the year 1825, the plans of the Madras government in this respect were brought to maturity, and that a committee was appointed (of which the Hon. Mr. Græme, was president and the writer of the aforegoing statement was nominated a member), for the general improvement of the education of the natives under that government. Part of the plan was the establishment of an institution at the presidency for qualifying candidates for the situation of teacher in the provinces where schools were to be endowed, in which, besides instruction in Arabic, Sanscrit, and the vernacular tongues, the English language will be taught, as a means of affording to the natives access to the European sciences.

CAPTAIN VALENTINE PYNE.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sin: In Christ Church, Newgate Street, on the floor near the altar, there is a marble slab with the following curious inscription, which you may perhaps think worthy of record in your publication, as it relates to one of the East-India Company's servants. The elegiac lines at the close are remarkable.

I am, Sir, &c.

C. C. C.

Capt. Valentine Pyne, born at St. Mary Antrey, in Devon, in ye year 1671 went to India, where he spent ye best part of his life in trade with the natives, by whome, particvlarly ye King of Bantam, he was highly respected and beloved for his integrity, honesty, and other good qualityes. Being forced to return by ye vnkindnes of som of his countrymen, he arrived in England in ye year 1688, and after three years stay, besides other compensations, he was by ye East-India Company made comander of one of thear best ships, ye New Bercley Castle. His ship being ready to sayl, he fell sick and dyed, February ye 11th 1691, lamented by all that knew him, aged 43 years, leaving issiu by his wife Anne only one daughter, Mary, aged 2 years.

Hic jacet ingenti casu pulcherrima pinus, Cujus erat saluber fructus et umbra sacra: Non rabido vento, aut sæva prostrata hipenni, Nec Jovis immani fulmine tacta ruit. Per frigora et æstus, et mille pericula, tutum, Perdidit empirici missa manu pilula.

<sup>. *</sup> Bantam was at that time one of the Company's principal factories.

CHARACTERS OF PUBLIC MEN IN INDIA:

DRAWN BY THE LATE BISHOP HEBER.

THE following sketches of official personages in India, from the candid and impartial pen of the late Bishop of Calcutta (not written with a view to publication), which appear in the journal of his first visitation to the provinces, and in his private correspondence, are so valuable and interesting, that we struple not to transfer them to our pages.

THE HON. M. ELPHINSTONE, LATE GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.

Mr. Elphinstone is, in every respect, an extraordinary man, possessing great activity of body and mind, remarkable talent for, and application to. public business, a love of literature, and a degree of almost universal information. such as I have met with in no other person similarly situated, and manners and conversation of the most amiable and interesting character. While he has seen more of India and the adjoining countries than any man now living. and has been engaged in active political, and sometimes military duties, since the age of eighteen, he has found time not only to cultivate the languages of Hindostan and Persia, but to preserve and extend his acquaintance with the Greek and Latin classics, with the French and Italian, with all the elder and more distinguished English writers, and with the current and popular literature of the day, both in poetry, history, politics, and political economy. With these remarkable accomplishments, and notwithstanding a temperance amounting to rigid abstinence, he is fond of society, and it is a common subject of surprise with his friends, at what hours of the day or night he finds time for the acquisition of knowledge. His policy, so far as India is concerned, appeared to me peculiarly wise and liberal, and he is evidently attached to, and thinks well of, the country and its inhabitants. His public measures, in their general tendency, evince a steady wish to improve their present condition. No government in India pays so much attention to schools and public institutions for education. In none are the taxes lighter, and in the administration of justice to the natives in their own languages, in the establishment of punchacts, in the degree in which he employs the natives in official situations, and the countenance and familiarity which he extends to all the natives of rank who approach him, he seems to have reduced to practice, almost all the reforms which had struck me as most required in the system of government pursued in those provinces of our eastern empire which I had previously visited. His popularity (though to such a feeling there may be individual exceptions) appears little less remarkable than his talents and acquirements, and I was struck by the remark I once heard, that " all other public men had their enemies and their friends, their admirers and their aspersors, but that of Mr. Elphinstone every body spoke highly." Of his munificence, for his liberality amounts to this, I had heard much, and knew some instances myself.

With regard to the free press, I was curious to know the motives or apprehensions which induced Mr. Elphinstone to be so decidedly opposed to it in this country. In discussing the topic he was always open and candid—acknow-ledged that the dangers ascribed to a free press in India had been exaggerated,—but spoke of the exceeding inconvenience, and even danger, which arose from the disunion and dissension which political discussion produced among the European officers at the different stations, the embarrassment occasioned to government by the exposure and canvass of all their measures by the Lentuli and Gracchi of a newspaper, and his preference of decided and vigorous, to half measures, where any restrictive measures at all were necessary. I confess that his opinion and experience are the strongest presumptions which I have yet met with in favour of the censorship.

A charge has been brought against Mr. Elphinstone by the indiscreet zeal of an amiable, but not well-judging man, the "field officer of cavalry," who published his Indian travels, that " he is devoid of religion, and blinded to all spiritual truth." I can only say that I saw no reason to think so. On the contrary, after this character which I had read of him, I was most agreeably surprised to find that his conduct and conversation, so far as I could learn. had been always moral and decorous, that he was regular in his attendance on public worship, and not only well informed on religious topics, but well pleased and forward to discuss them; that his views appeared to me, on all essential subjects, doctrinally correct, and his feelings serious and reverential; and that he was not only inclined to do, but actually did, more for the encouragement of Christianity, and the suppression or diminution of suttees, than any other Indian governor has ventured on. That he may have differed in some respects from the peculiar views of the author in question, I can easily believe, though he could hardly know himself in what this difference consisted, since I am assured, that he had taken his opinion at second-hand, and not from any thing which Mr. Elphinstone had either said or done. But I have been unable to refrain from giving this slight and imperfect account of the character of Mr. Elphinstone as it appeared to me, since I should be sorry to have it thought that one of the ablest and most amiable men I ever met with, were either a profligate or an unbeliever.

THE LATE MR. JOHN ADAM.

Mr. Adam, in spite of all which has been said and written, is, and uniformly has been, one of the most popular men in India. He is, perhaps, the only public man in whom, in any great degree, both Europeans and natives have confidence; and his absence from Calcutta during the early part of the war, and his present determination, which has just reached these provinces, to return to Europe, have been regarded by all, without exception, whom I have heard speak on the subject, as the heaviest calamities which could have befallen British India. I was Mr. Adam's guest for a few days at Almorah, and greatly pleased both with his manners and conversation; but he was then weak both in health and spirits, and my opinion of him has been formed rather from what I heard, than what I have myself known of him.

SIR JOHN MALCOLM, PRESENT GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.

The character which Malcolm has left behind him in Western and Central India, is really extraordinary. As political agent, he had many difficulties to contend with, of which the jealousy entertained of him, as a Madras officer, by the Bengal army, is not the least. But during his stay, he seems to have conciliated all classes of Europeans in a manner which hardly any other man could have done, while the native chiefs, whom I have seen, asked after him with an anxiety and regard which I could not think counterfeited, inasmuch as they did not pretend any thing equal to it when speaking of other grates are not.

Except Sir John Malcolm, I have heard of no one whom all parties agree in commending. His talents, his accessibility, his firmness, his conciliating manners, and admirable knowledge of the native language and character, are spoken of in the same terms by all.

THE LATE SIR THOMAS MUNRO.

It was interesting to find only one voice about Sir Thomas Munro, whose talents, steadiness, and justice, seemed admitted by every body; he is a fine, dignified old soldier, with a very strong and original understanding, and a solid practical judgment; he is excellently adapted for the situation which he holds; and his popularity is, perhaps, the more honourable to him, because his manners, though unaffected and simple, are reserved and grave, at least on a first acquaintance.—Sir Thomas is a man of very considerable talent, and is universally respected and esteemed by all whom I have yet heard speak of firm.

Lady Munro is a very lovely woman, and of remarkably pleasing manners: every body here (Madras) seems to regret most honestly her going away, saying that her whole conduct has been made up of good manners, good heart, and sound solid judgment. I do not know that higher praise could be given to a "Lady Governess."

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JAMES TOD.

All the provinces of Meywar were, for a considerable time after their connexion with the British government, under the administration of Captain Tod. whose name appears to be held in a degree of affection and respect by all the upper and middling classes of society, highly honourable to him, and sufficient to rescue these poor people from the often repeated charge of ingratitude. Here (Dabla) and in our subsequent stages, we were continually asked by the cutwals, &c. after "Tod Sahib," whether his health was better since he returned to England, and whether there was any chance of their seeing him again? On being told it was not likely, they all expressed much regret, saying, that the country had never known quiet till he came among them, and that every body, whether rich or poor, except thieves and Pindarrees, loved him. He, in fact, Dr. Smith told me, loved the people of this country, and understood their language and manners in a very unusual degree. He was on terms of close friendship with Zalim Singh of Kotah, and has left a name there as honourable as in Odcypoor. His misfortune was that, in consequence of his favouring the native princes so much, the government of Calcutta were led to suspect him of corruption, and consequently to narrow his powers and associate other officers with him in his trust, till he was disgusted and resigned his place. They are now, I believe, well satisfied that their suspicions were groundless. Captain Tod is strenuously vindicated from the charge by all the officers with whom I have conversed, and some of whom have had abundant means of knowing what the natives themselves thought of him.

Here too (Bheelwara), every body was full of Captain Tod's praise. The place had been entirely ruined by Jumsheed Khân and deserted by all its inhabitants, when Captain Tod persuaded the Ranah to adopt measures for encouraging the owners of land to return, and foreign merchants to settle; he himself drew up a code of regulations for them, obtained them an immunity from taxes for a certain number of years, and sent them patterns of different articles of English manufacture for their imitation. He also gave money liberally to the beautifying their town. In short, as one of the merchants who called on me said, "it ought to be called Tod-gunge; but there is no need, for we shall never forget him." Such praise as this, from people who had no further hopes of seeing or receiving any benefit from him, is indeed of sterling value.

LORD COMBERMERE.

Lord Combermere is very popular, from his constant accessibility and close attention to business, as well as by his good-natured and cordial manners.

I really

I really believe you* could have found no person better suited to play the very difficult and important task which was placed in his hands, from his good sense, his readiness in despatch of business, and his accessibility, which had gone far to gain him the good-will of the Company's army, even before his success at Bhurtpoor. He appears at present to enjoy a higher reputation than any commander-in-chief since Lord Cornwallis, or any officer who has appeared in India, except Sir A. Wellesley.

THE LATE SIR DAVID OCHTERLONY.

Sir David Ochterlony, who, as agent to the Governor-general, is the common arbitrator and referee in the disputes of these little sovereigns (of Raipootana), is said to maintain an almost kingly state. His income from different sources is little less than 15,000 sicca rupees monthly (upwards of £20,000 a year), and he spends it almost all. Dr. Smith, in his late march from Mhow to Meerut, passed by Sir David's camp. The "burra sahib," or great man, was merely travelling with his own family and personal followers from Delhi to Jyepoor, but his retinue, including servants, escort, European and native aides-de-camp, and the various nondescripts of an Asiatic train. together with the apparatus of horses, elephants, and camels, the number of his tents, and the size of the enclosure hung round with red cloth, by which his own and his daughter's private tents were fenced in from the eyes of the prophane, were what an European, or even an old Indian, whose experience had been confined to Bengal, would scarcely be brought to credit. All this is at least harmless, and so far as it suits the habits and ideas of the natives themselves, it may have a good effect. But in Agra and Delhi, though Sir David is uniformly spoken of as a kind, honourable, and worthy man, I was shocked to find that the venality and corruption of the people by whom he is surrounded was a matter of exceeding scandal. Against one of his moonshees it appears he had been frequently warned without effect, till at length, in the course of a casual conversation with the emperor's treasurer, Sir David found, to his astonishment, that his own name stood as a pensioner on the poor old sovereign's civil list to the amount of 1,000 rupees monthly! The moonshee had demanded it in his master's name; to refuse was out of the question; and delicacy had prevented the emperor from naming the subject to the person whom, as he supposed, he was laying under an obligation! So careful ought public men in India to be that their servants do not abuse their authority.

THE LATE JUDGE CLEVELAND, OF BOGLIPOOR.

The people of these mountains (Rajmahal), and of all the hilly country between this place and Burdwan, are a race distinct from those of the plain, in features, language, civilization, and religion. A deadly feud existed, till within the last forty years, between them and the cultivators of the neighbouring lowlands, they being untamed thieves and murderers, continually making forays, and the Mahommedan zemindars killing them like mad dogs or tigers whenever they got them within gun-shot. An excellent young man, of the name of Cleveland, judge and magistrate of Boglipoor, undertook to remedy this state of things. He rigorously forbade, and promptly punished, all violence from the zemindars (who were often the aggressors) against the Puharree (mountaineers): he got some of these last to enter his service, and took pains to attach them to him and to learn their language. He made shooting parties into the mountains, treating kindly all whom he could get to approach him, and established regular bazars at the villages nearest to them, where he encouraged them to bring down for sale game, millet, wax, hides, and honey, all which their hills produce in great abundance. He gave them wheat and barley for seed, and encouraged their cultivation by the assurance that they should not be taxed, and that nobody but their own chiefs should be their zemindars. And to please them still further, and at the same time to keep them in effectual order, and to bring them more into contact with their civilized neighbours, he raised a corps of sepoys from among them, which he stationed at Sicligully, and which enabled him not only to protect the peaceable part of them, but to quell any disturbances which might arise, with a body of troops accustomed to mountain warfare. This good and wise man died in 1784, in the 29th year of his age. A monument was raised to his memory near Boglipoor, at the joint expense of the highland chiefs and lowland zemindars, which still remains in good repair, having been endowed by them with some lands for its maintenance. The monument is in the form of a Hindu mut (obelisk), in a pretty situation on a green hill. As being raised to the memory of a Christian, it is called by the natives Grige (church); and they still meet once a year in considerable numbers, and have a handsome "poojah," or religious spectacle, in honour of his memory.

BRITISH GOVERNORS OF INDIA.

I was curious to know what governor of India had stood highest in their good opinion (at Benares), and found that they usually spoke of Warren Hastings and Lord Wellesley as the two greatest men who had ever ruled this part of the world; but that they spoke with most affection of Mr. Jonathan Duncan. Duncan sahib ka chota bhace, "Mr. Duncan's younger brother," is still the usual term of praise applied to any public man who appears to be actuated by an unusual spirit of kindness and liberality towards their nation. Of the sultan-like and splendid character of Warren Hastings, many traits are preserved; and a nursery rhyme, which is often sung to children, seems to show how much they were pleased with the Oriental (not European) pomp which he knew how to employ on occasion:

Hat'hee pur howdah, ghore pur jeen, Juldee bah'r jata Sahib Warren Husteen!

Of Lord Hastings I have not found that they have retained any very favourable impression. Yet the extent of his conquests, and his pleasing manners during his short visit, must, I should think, have struck them.

BRITISH FUNCTIONARIES.

Of course among these different functionaries there is an abundant difference of character and talent; but the impression made on my mind is favourable, on the whole, to their diligence and good intentions; nor can there be more useful or amiable characters than some of the elder servants of the Company, who, eschewing Calcutta altogether, have devoted themselves for many years to the advantage of the land in which their lot is thrown, and are looked up to, throughout-considerable districts, with a degree of respectful attachment which it is not easy to believe counterfeited. Mr. Brooke, of Benares, is precisely a character of this description. Mr. Hawkins, of Barcilly, and Mr. Traill, the judge of Almorah, are others, and Sir David Ochterlony would have been an example still more conspicuous, were it not for the injurious confidence which he is said to place in his servants.

TIMUR.

(Concluded from p. 836.)

From the subjection of Persia, and that of the Tartarian nations which extend from the Jaxartes to the frontiers of China, to the invasion of Hindoostan, there is nothing very interesting to the general reader in the life of Timur. Nor is this last stupendous revolution in Asiatic history well told by our author: it occupies but a very few pages of his work; and the account is, in several respects, not only defective, but inaccurate. This is little to be wondered at when we consider that he visited not India as he did the other scenes of Timur's wars, and that he could consequently possess on this subject no information beyond that which he received through the distorted and fallacious medium of common report. We should despair of making any part of the relation acceptable to the reader who has any acquaintance with the Intitules and Sherefeddin Ali, or with Ferishta, and the other native authorities for the Mogul conquest. For this reason, we altogether omit this portion of Arabshah's history, and proceed to what we consider the more valuable, or at least the more original, portion of the work.

Before Timur left India, he received a most extraordinary letter from his son Amiran, whom he had placed over Aderbijan, which is not altogether such as might have been expected from a dependent son to a father—least of all to such a father as the emperor—the most haughty and powerful of men. Little as we rely on its authenticity, it is too curious to be omitted here: we have, however, been constrained to abridge it; for its prolixity is, in some places, exceedingly painful:

Thou art now old, thy constitution is feeble, and thou art in consequence unable to erect the standard of empire, or to sustain the oppressive weight of government. It becometh thee, therefore, before death call thee hence, to frequent the holy mosques, and to be constantly occupied in serving God. Thou hast sons and grandsons qualified to govern thy states, to lead thine armies, to defend thy dignity and possessions: what hast thou, who so soon must die, to do with earthly greatness? If thou hast any reflection left, abandon human pursuits, and turn thine attention to those which are divine. If thou shouldst obtain a kingdom mighty as that of Sjeddad, Amalek, and Adi; if victorious fortune should exalt thee to the majesty of Haman or Pharaoh, and a fourth part of the earth should be tributary to thee; if thou shouldst be richer than Korah, and in war more prosperous than Nebuchadnezzar, to whom God granted great power, but whom he soon degraded; if even thy sway should extend to the ends of the world, thy wishes should all be gratified, and thy life prolonged to a miraculous degree; if thou shouldst render subject to thy dominion the greatest kings, such as the Roman emperor, the Persian Chosrocs, and the Abyssinian Al Nesjash; if the mightiest monarchs and princes should approach thee as slaves and dependents; if the Chinese Faguer should bend the knee to thee, and thy pavilion be elevated above that of the most puissant khans, who should prostrate themselves before thee; if Iran and Touran, and all the mines of the earth, should be there; would not thy usurped greatness end in impotence, thy life in death, thy dwelling in the tomb? Wouldst thou be compared with Noah, that pattern of religion and virtue? with Lockman, who gave such precepts to his son, and cherished his nature to an old age? with David, whose kingdom was so vast, and who yet was so unwearied in worshipping his God? with his son Solomon, who ruled over men, devils, the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the winds of heaven? with Alexander, who ruled the east and the west, who dwelt among the Sjaddad, a famous but probably a fabulous king of Arabia, who is said by some to have lived, by others to have reigned, 260 years; Adi was one of his predecessors.

mountains, and reduced so many nations to his sway? So, thou art higher than the prince of prophets, the chief of the elect, the teacher before Adam's creation-the mighty Mahomet, whom distant realms obey, who is venerated by the visible and inviable worlds; who understandeth hidden things; in whom angels, devils, wild beasts, and even reptiles believed; whom God strengthened to overcome the Lord of the Mountain; who flew on the wings of conquest to the most remote parts; whom God helped when driven by the unbelievers from Mecca, and transported in one night from the cave to the temple of Jerusalem; who ascended on his noble ass Al-borak to the seven heavens; whose name is glorious in the sight both of God and man; for whom the universe was erected; who had the gift of working the most stupendous miracles, who fed a multitude with a few cakes, who quenched the thirst of numbers by the water which flowed wonderfully from his fingers, for whom the moon was split, to whom a tree walked, in whom a lizard believed, and whom a stone saluted! Speak, and thou shalt be heard; pray, and thou shalt be accepted; seek, and thou shalt find; imitate the example of the great and good, of the orthodox caliphs, especially Abu-bekr and Omar, who were the stars of true faith; of the perfect kings and excellent sultans who observed the commands of God, and defended his worshippers from oppression. Thou rulest men; thou distributest justice, but not in righteousness; thou protectest thy subjects, but at the same time consumest their subsistence by vexations. If thou shouldst ascend above the seven solid heavens, thou couldst not tread in the footsteps of Pharoah and Sjeddad; if thou shouldst elevate thy palace above the highest mountains, thou couldst not reach the paradise of Adi, to which nothing on earth ever can be compared. Let this exhortation not be lost on thee. Shew thyself a friend of God, of Mahomet, and the faithful. If thou persist in laying waste the earth, I will meet, oppose, and restrain thee from such excesses, and thereby teach thee to proceed in the right path.

There is no doubt, we think, that the preceding wild letter is the invention of our historian; or if one were really written, the exaggerations, the hyperbolical expressions, and the unwarrantable freedoms, must be attributed to the imaginative Syrian. Fearless, uncurbed, and self-willed as the young prince is represented to have been, he could never, unless indeed his wits wore fled, venture to draw certain destruction on his head by such an epistle. The father, we are told, soon left India, hastened to the son, overthrew him in battle, slew his partizans, but the ties of nature induced the conqueror to save the leader, who was believed to have been led astray by treasonable counsels. Preparations were then made for the war against Bajazet, whose success in Asia Minor awakened the jealousy of Timur on the banks of the Ganges.

After some unimportant operations in the mountains of Armenia, Timur directed his immense host (consisting, it is said, of 800,000 men) against Syria. That host was formed of very various materials; it had been assembled from every conquered country. "It was truly a flight of locusts," subject to no law, and panting for blood and desolation. "In that cursed army were the soldiers of Iran, the warriors of Touran, the leopards of Turkey, the tigers of Balaksan, the hawks of Deschta and Kata, the Mogul vultures, the boncheaking eagles of Getica, the vipers of Khogend, the basilisks of Andekhan, the serpents of Khoresm, the wild beasts of Gargan, the eagles of Dagantan, the hunting dogs of Husar-Sjadman, the horsemen of Persia, the lious of Khorasan and Mezenderan, the hyenas of Ghilan, the wild beasts of the mountains, the crocodiles of Restemdar and Talican, the asps of Susa and Caramania, the wolves of Ispahan, Rajan, Gazne, and Hamada, the elephants of India, the rams of Luren, the bulls from the losty mountains of Ghaur, the scorpions of Sjabresour, the snakes of Asker-Makrem and Jundisapura,— &#x27; Fierce heasts, whose teeth were grinning for the prey, And which to share the slaughter sped away."

No wonder that such a devouring army should prove resistess, when appeared to the sheep of Syria. To the various governors of that country Timur wrote, requiring them to surrender their respective fortresses, and assuring them that the lord of natious could not be withstood. The strongest of them fell successively into his power; the caliph of Egypt, who hastened to defend them, was defeated, but not so as to be unable to make head a second time against the invader. The result was again unsuccessful; the caliph's camp was set on fire, whether by treachery, or by an emissary of the enemy, is doubtful; and he was in consequence compelled to retreat. The Syrian nobles, left alone to stem the torrent which was overflowing the country, and which they began to regard as resistless, resolved to submit. Their trembling emissaries were admitted into his presence, and by the artful flattery of one among them, that submission was accepted.

While at Damascus, Timur went to prayers in the magnificent mosque of the Ommiades. One day many Syrian doctors were present, who, after the conclusion of the service, were ordered into his presence. One of them, Nazareddin, was not only sprung from Othman, but also from the caliph Qmar. When Timur understood this, he pretended to hold the doctor in great honour. exclaiming, " O thou of holy race! were I not old and infirm, I would bear thee on my shoulders: both thou and thy brethren shall experience my favour." This, however, was sheer hypocrisy; for he was all the time revolving in his mind how he might entrap them to their ruin. After long consideration, he inquired: "which is more excellent, knowledge or noble birth?" This question perplexed them; but at length the cadi Sjemsoddin replied: "knowledge is more excellent in the eyes both of God and man; the poorest, if learned, is better than the noblest, if ignorant. So thought the companions of the prophet, who preferred Abu-bekr to Ali, because the former was of superior learning, and better established in the faith." This pleased Timur, whose own birth, according to our historian, was mean enough. Gibbon has extracted from our author the account of an interview, in which questions still more captious were answered with wonderful presence of mind. To that celebrated conference we refer the reader.

All Syria having submitted, 20,000 troops were despatched to besiege Bagdad, the sacred city of the caliphs, which was taken and sacked. The war was then directed with accumulated fury against Bajazet.

The two famous conquerors commenced by a correspondence mutually insulting, and sufficiently betraying the impatience with which either suffered an equal. As that correspondence has been given before, we will not repeat it here. Bajazet made mighty preparations against the approaching storm: not only did he assemble all the troops which his widely spread dominions could furnish, but he prevailed on some of the Tartarian nations to join him in resisting the progress of one who appeared resolved to subjugate every country under heaven. To dissipate this alliance was one of Timur's chief objects. By his secret emissaries he represented to the Tartars that his and their ancestors were the same; that in consequence he naturally bore them a strong affection; that they were his inner, while other people were merely his outer garment; that their dependence on the Ottoman lord was degrading, and their opposition to himself both imprudent and unnatural; and he concluded by holding out to them the alluring prospect of plunder and independence. " He tempted them just as the devil tempts men to wickedness," until they agreed among themselves to desert the Turkish standard whenever the two armies should meet in deadly conflict. In

In his march against the Tartar, Bajazet is praised for his paternal regard towards his subjects, and the rigid severity with which he punished the excesses of his soldiers. Of this the following anecdote affords a fearful example. On a certain occasion, one of the Turkish soldiers, being parched with thirst. entered the cottage of a peasant woman, and requested a draught of water. She was a sordid, avaricious creature, and she denied that there was any in the house. He perceived some milk in a vessel, and as his thirst was intolerable. he seized and drank it, observing at the same time that it was fit only for boys. She complained to Bajazet, who immediately sent for the soldier, and interrogated him as to the fact. Fearful of punishment, he denied the truth of the charge. Then the sultan, turning to the woman, said, "I will rip open his helly to see whether he speaks truly or falsely. If the milk be found within him, the price shall be given to thee; but if it be not, thyself shalt undergo the same punishment."-"God is my witness," rejoined she, "that I have snoken the truth, and that he has lied; but let him be freed from his anxiety. I forgive him." This, however, did not satisfy the sultan, who resolved that strict justice should be done. The sentence was accordingly put into execution; the body was cut open with a sabre, by Bajazet himself, and out came the milk mixed with blood. The corpse was then paraded throughout the camp, and proclamation made aloud: "This is his reward who, under the sway of the just descendant of Othman, dares to take what is not his own!"

The result of the great battle under the walls of Ancyra is well known. The Tartars, according to their agreement, passed over to Timur, and Bajazet was taken prisoner. It does not appear that he was for some time treated with any other than kindness by his conqueror, but the ungovernable fury of his temper. increased as it was by his unequalled pride, precipitated him into ruin. That there is ground for considering the story of the iron cage an historic fact,* Arabshah may be appealed to as no incompetent authority, supported as he is by two other writers, who, like him, may be almost considered contemporary, Unable to brook the indignities which his own impatience and the savage haughtiness of the triumphant Tartar inflicted on him, he put a period to his life a few months after his defeat. Our historian does not say that he killed himself, but merely that "the august, heroic sultan and martyr was translated to the mercy of God."

This decisive victory over the hitherto unconquered Ottoman; was followed by the submission of the vast regions from the Tigris to the Bosphoras. In Georgia, however, the career of Timur was checked for a season. In the very heart of the country was a lofty, precipitous mountain, on the summit of which was a strong fortress, and the only ascent was by a very narrow path, so that a few individuals could defend it against a host. This was not all: a draw-bridge lay over a deep ditch which had been dug on one side the fortification; on the three remaining sides none was necessary, as they hung over frightful precipices, and were utterly inaccessible. In the day-time this draw-bridge was raised; but in the evening it was lowered to permit the Christians to seek forage in the neighbourhood: it was not, however, suffered to remain lowered during their absence. Towards morning they returned, and by the same way were re-admitted. When Timur surveyed the strength of the place, he justly deemed it impregnable. But his pride could ill brook the thought of leaving it unattacked, and still less of not taking it when assailed: he knew that it contained a numerous body of the enemy, with their families, and and most precious effects. He pitched his tent at some distance from the base, in the hope that some fortunate accident would put it in his power. He did at length gain possession of it, and by a singular stratagem.

* See this fact, however, disproved by Mr. Von Hammer, Asiat. Journ., vol. xxii. p. 104.—ED.

In Timur's army were two young warriors, rivals of each other, and "fierce as lions." The constant aim of each was to do something that should exceed the bravest actions of the other. This emulation had continued a long time, and had given rise to several valiant deeds on each side. On a certain occasion one of them fell in with a Georgian "strong as a lion, and tail as a tower." whom he fought and slew, carrying the head to the emperor. For this heroic act he was greatly praised, and raised to a much higher post. On seeing this. nothing could exceed the despite of the other. So great was the mortifying impression made on his mind that he resolved, whatever might be the consequence, to attempt something that should be acknowledged superior, that should humble his rival by obtaining for himself a more honourable name. He iustly thought that if by stratagem he could secure possession of the drawbridge, his fame would be glorious enough. One night, therefore, he hid himself in an unfrequented place, where he sometimes lay contemplating the stars, at other times crawling on his belly, or creeping on his hands and knees up the abrupt and dangerous precipice towards the entrance of the fortress. Towards morning the Christians returned as usual; the draw-bridge was lowered; and Bir Mohammed (so our soldier was called) rose up, and cut the ropes by which it was moved. Stones and arrows were showered on and around him, yet as the obscurity was favourable to him, he escaped destruction, though he received many severe wounds. The sun soon arose, and it happened that Timur himself imagined he perceived from his tent unusual confusion about the entrenched position of the enemy. He despatched some of his followers to ascertain the cause. "These ran like so many incarnate devils" until they reached Bir Mohammed, who was on the very brink of fate, overpowered, and laid on the ground. When he saw them approach, he made a desperate effort, stood on his feet, and entered with the retreating Christians into the fortification before they had time to close the gates. He resolved to keep them open until his comrades came up; and he fought desperately, opposed by numbers, "who fell on him like the storms of heaven." He was soon extricated from his perilous situation; the place with all it contained was taken; and himself brought to Timur, whose admiration at the adventure exceeded all bounds. That emperor sent him to Tauris, and commanded the governors and generals of the province to see that the most skilful surgeons were provided for him. Though he had received eighteen wounds, each of which was sufficient to cause death, yet by their care he recovered, returned to the camp, and was promoted to one of the highest military dignities.

All Asia being conquered, Timur returned to Samarcand, where preparations magnificent beyond all belief were made for the union of his grandson with a Persian princess. As our author's florid account of these entertainments has been translated by the historian of the Roman empire, we will not repeat them.

But neither the glory nor the power of the tyrant could preserve him from the common lot of mankind. While on an expedition undertaken for health rather than conquest, he drank wine to excess; "nor did he refrain from the cup until that of death was brought him." "This cursed beverage penetrated his vitals; his physicians were called, but their art was of no avail. A voice sounded in his cars: 'Impure soul, which art contained on an impure body, come come out, cursed, wicked, devilish! henceforth thou shalt roll in boiling water, or liquid sulphur, and herd with the reprobate!" "The tormenting angels were at hand, and his spirit was dragged to the place where God's curse and punishment awaited him, and where he must remain a prey to infernal tortures. It was on Wednesday the seventeenth day of the month Sjaban, A.H. 807, and in the plains of Otrar, that Almighty God in his great mercy to mortals called away this wretch;—the branch which had done wickedly was cut off; Allah be praised for ever!"

After this triumphant consignment of the emperor to the fierce tortures of hell, our author devotes a considerable number of chapters to the revolutions which the Tartarian regions subsequently underwent; but as the reader will probably have little curiosity to learn what was done by the ambitious chiefs of the deceased conqueror,—how they carried on an exterminating war not only on one another, but even on the family of the once dreaded khan, we altogether pass over this portion of the subject. Before concluding, however, we will advert to some further particulars respecting the character and habits of Timur, which, without the slightest regard to method, Ahmed has accumulated towards the close of his work.

Timur was lofty in stature, and of a commanding appearance; he was exceedingly strong and courageous; fair in countenance, with a noble forehead; his body perfectly symmetrical, if we except the lameness which disfigured him; and his voice was loud, even terrible. He feared not danger or death; he loved not jesting or lying; and he delighted not in mirth, but truth pleased him. He was not depressed in adversity, nor lifted up in prosperity. He was brave himself, and loved bravery in others. He excelled in counsel, was firm to his purpose, and true to his promises. So acute was his mind, that he comprehended the whole of a thing at a single glance: he was watchful as to the slightest matters: deceit, however artfully covered, did not escape him; he could at once distinguish the true from the false. When he commanded any thing to be done, he never recalled his mandate; and never was there seen in him any wavering in design. He was generally called "the Unconquered Ruler of the Seven Climates, the Emperor of Land and Sea, and the Lord of Kings and Sultans." He had a great taste for study: he was much given to reading history, in which indeed he delighted. He was well acquainted with all known countries, their towns, forts, rivers, mountains, tribes, and languages. He would often repeat to his familiar friends the whole chain of events in any nation from its origin to his own time; so that his knowledge seemed more than human, and some thought that he must have derived it from the devil. Often when any one read to him out of any Particular history, and made a mistake, he would immediately correct the reader; "but then an ass can find its way in a road which it is in the habit of travelling." He loved the society of learned men, whom he held in the highest honour. Nor did he pay less respect to science,-to eminent architects and mechanics. Players and poets he did not much like : his taste inclined towards the useful rather than the elegant. "He adhered to the laws of Ghengis Khan,-whom God curse !-in preference to those of the Koran; for which reason our doctor Hafeddin Mohammed,-to whom God shew favour! -and our doctor Aladdin Mohammed of Bokhara, whom God preserve !and other orthodox professors, assert that he was no better than an infidel."

The magnificence of Timur was unequalled. All the kings and khans of the vast regions over which he led his armies, were in the habit of sending him valuable presents; for they were merely his tributaries. Of the reverence in which he was held, the following is a proof. One day some of his soldiers were occupied in playing at a certain game, and a dispute arose among them concerning some trifling matter. In support of his cause, one of them exclaimed — By the head of the Emperor Timur! the thing is so. Whereupon one of the opposite party slapped him in the face, and rated him as much as if he had killed John the Baptist, or denied Mahomet, or acknowledged Moses as the greatest of men. He who struck the blow at the same time said: "Pitiful, contemptible creature! thy impudence amounts to sacrilege in pronouncing with thy lips the name of our Lord the Emperor. Whence such presumption, that thou, who wouldst be honoured by the tread of his foot, shouldst swear by his head? He is too exalted that his name, or any thing concerning him, should be spoken by me, or thee, or any other: he is greater than Chosroes, Kaikas, and Kaccabad, who held the dominion of east and west;—than even Nebuchadnezzar and Sjeddad."

Timur's sense of honour was equal to that of any other man who ever lived. One of his wives, Galbana by name, was surpassingly beautiful, and of unimpeachable conduct. Malevolence, however, had accused her of some crime, and she was put to death by order of the emperor, who, though firmly convinced of her innocence, would not allow her to live: she had incurred suspicion,—crime enough in his eyes.

Of Timur's attachment to war, which forsook him not even when nature was exhausted by sickness, and of his belief that he was an instrument in the hands of heaven, the following characteristic anecdote is related by Mahmud Abafid Almobrek, a chief of Khoresm:

In one of his expeditions Timur insisted that I should accompany him: day and night was I about his person. When any town was besieged, he was accustomed to pitch his tent on higher ground, that he might survey the operations on both sides. On one occasion he was sick of a fever, and left alone with myself and two others; his troops were then making a fierce attack on the enemy, and the conflict raged furiously. Anxious to observe all that passed, he said to us: "take me to the door of the tent." He was accordingly wheeled to the entrance, whence he could see the whole contention: I was standing by his side. Soon he despatched one of my two companions with some orders to his troops. He then said: "lay me on the ground." We did so. He then despatched the other with a mandate to his officers, so that he and I were left alone. He then addressed me: "Mahmud, look at the weakness of my body, and my exhausted strength; my hands and feet are both powerless. If my followers forsook me, what should I do? what could I do? It is evident, then, that the Almighty has subjected men to my power, has opened to me the door of many kingdoms, and filled the world with the terror of my name: before me has humbled the greatest sovereigns, the Chosroes and Cæsars of the earth. Whose then are such deeds but his? And who am I but a weak and inconsiderable being, unable without such assistance to accomplish these mighty things?" He then wept, and I wept with him.

The very women in the emperor's army were heroic. They frequently engaged in the conflict, and overcame the most renowned of the other sex. They could handle the spear, the sword, and the bow, with surprising dexterity. "When any one of them was seized with the pains of labour on the march, she turned off from the road, descended from the beast which carried her, brought forth her offspring, wrapped it in a garment, swung it by her side or before her, re-mounted, and pursued her way as if nothing had happened. Many were born, reared, married, and had offspring of their own, without possessing or seeking any fixed habitation."

THE SAN-LUEN RIVER.

WE have been favoured with a notice of an excursion up the San-luen, or Martaban river, of which the following is the substance. The river is of considerable interest, not only from its rising very far to the north, in Tibet, or on the Chinese frontier, in that direction, where it is known as the Nau-kiang; but for the richness and importance of the vegetable products along its source in the province of Martaban.

The party left Martaban on the 10th March, with the flood tide and a s. W. breeze. The river has the peculiarity of being clear and fresh at a very short distance from the sea: in consequence, its banks, instead of being overrun with plants, usually found within the influence of salt water, are of a different description. The banks at first slope gradually to the water, but they soon rise considerably above it, and are sufficiently elevated to prevent inundation. Above Martaban, the river side is covered with high grass and erythrings, intermixed with betel palms and occasional clumps of plantain trees: hehind, at a short distance, runs a range of hills sparingly covered with vegetation. The course of the river, at its mouth, is due north, and it continues in that direction almost to its source, with frequent bends to east and west. After advancing about fourteen miles, the wind and tide failing, the boats were anchored about five P. M. Both sides of the river at this place were studded with a number of small conical hills, nearly bare. The western bank was lofty, and consisted of a soft porous sandstone with much ferruginous admixture. The thermometer at three P. M. stood at 95°.

The 11th set in with a damp heavy fog, which lasted till eight o'clock: the hills were covered with mist for some time after. These fogs are common at this season, and contribute materially to promote vegetation; they also serve to cool the atmosphere, reducing the temperature sometimes twenty degrees. On this day's route, the hills became numerous, and although villages were not seen, yet columns of smoke in all directions indicated their presence. On the left bank lay Trugla, a large village opposite to an upper end of a long flat island, which divides the river into two unequal branches. The adjacent hills are of limestone, of dark hue and rugged outline; they not unfrequently rise almost perpendicularly to the height of 500 or 600 feet, and are covered with shrubs and small trees.

About two miles to the S.W. from the landing-place, opposite to Trugla, is the celebrated cave of Kogun. The path to it leads through groves of coconuts and palmiras, and a palm of a more stately growth, which, instead of flowering annually, puts forth large panieles only in thirty or forty years, and then dies down to the root. The height, from the base to the top of the inflorescence, is sometimes nearly an hundred and forty feet. The varnish tree also occurs on the path: it grows sometimes to the height of forty feet; with a stem of eleven feet in girth. The varnish is extracted by tapping the bark with short joints of a small kind of bamboo, cut at one end like a pen; these are thrust obliquely into the bark, and serve at the same time to collect the exudation: one hundred, or one hundred and fifty, of such bamboos are sometimes inserted at the same time; each is about half filled in twenty-four hours, when it is withdrawn.

Close to the cave stand two trees of a new genus, called, by Dr. Wallich, Amherstia nobilis. They grow to the height of about forty feet, and bear large pendulous panicles of vermilion blossoms, forming an object, the splendour of which is unrivalled in the Flora of this, or perhaps of any country. The Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149.

4 N

Burmans

Burmans call the tree Thoka, and the flowers are offered to the images of their saints. The Jonesia Asoka grows in considerable numbers in the same spot, and is inferior in beauty only to the preceding.

The hill consists of limestone interspersed with veins of quartz; on being struck with a hammer, it emits a smell not unlike that of ignited gunpowder. The limestone is burnt, and yields lime of excellent quality.

The cave is spacious, but not deep, and descends gently from the base of the hill: it was literally filled with gilt images of Buddha in the usual sitting or reclining positions, some of marble and some of clay; some were colossal, others small. The vault, except where stalactites were depending, was studded with the latter, about the size of the palm of the hand, made of clay indurated by fire, and curiously carved.

On the morning of the 12th, which was free from fog, a visit was paid to Trugla, on the opposite bank. It is a village of considerable extent, lying close to a hill projecting into the river, and covered on the river face with small white temples; similar edifices are observable on the loftier eminences in the distance, to which it might be imagined the foot of man had never ascended. A number of boats were lying off the village, and the loom and forge were busily plied. Cotton and indigo were cultivated here, and a dye is rudely prepared from the latter. The mango tree grows in the vicinity to a considerable size, and the palas abounds in the jungle. The fields had been lately cleared for rice by burning, and the ashes of the jungle covered the soil to the depth of some inches, serving, no doubt, as valuable manure. Above three miles from Trugla, amongst the hills, extends a thick forest, with many curious and valuable trees. A Karcan village is situated at the entrance into the forest, amidst a cultivation of tobacco, mustard, and cotton, the latter very fine. The plantain and the betel vine also grow luxuriantly.

Beyond Trugla, the banks of the river become more lofty, and the hills on either hand more clevated and frequent. A very fine kind of cotton grows in this tract, fully equal, if not superior, to the Barbadoes cotton reared in India, the produce of which was pronounced at home superior to any in the London market. Coco-nuts and palms are frequent. The river is beautifully clear, and the depth of water not less than three to five fathoms. In the afternoon, the day's journey terminated at Phance.

13th March.-Phanoe consists of a few huts, occupied by Kareans. This was the first place on the Saluen at which teak trees were found: there were a few amongst the huts, and a grove a little way inland. They were in general of irregular growth and low stature, the best having been evidently removed some time ago: the average girth of those on the spot, at four feet above the ground, was above nine feet, and the length of undivided stem nearly twelve and a half. In the same grove was an artocarpus, which had been stripped of its bark, and, on inquiry, it was found that the natives use it to masticate with their paun as a substitute for kuth, or catechu. There is some fine cotton cultivation in this neighbourhood, including the yellow kind. Rice is grown to a small extent. At the time the place was visited, this article was selling at eighty rupees a hundred bags, a rate unusually high, and rather unaccountably so, as the harvest had been abundant. The natives ascribed it to the great influx of people subsequent to the war, but this appeared scarcely adequate to account for the enhanced price. Soon after leaving Phanoe the country becomes very beautiful, and the banks of the river very lofty; in one place they rise perpendicularly from the water's edge at least four hundred feet. In attempting to pass to the east of a large island in the river, the stream became so shallow that the boats grounded, and were obliged to return and ascend by the other channel: two canoes were met going down to Martaban, but very few boats had been encountered.

14th March.—The route continued along the western channel, which contained between three and four fathoms of water; the banks were lofty and covered with jungle: on the right bank several kioums, or Burman monasteries, were passed. At the upper end of an island lay the village of KoaTheyn, occupied by Burmans and Taliens, engaged chiefly in the cultivation of cotton and tobacco. A float of several thousand small bamboos was lying off this place, on their way from Miayng to Moal Mein: they cost at the former place one rupee a hundred, and sell for three rupees at the latter.

15th March.—Two villages were passed on the left bank, the last called Payprouh: the people here mostly hid themselves on the appearance of the boats. It will be some time before they learn to feel confidence in any thing that wears the semblance of authority, of the abuse of which they have been so long accustomed under their former masters.

The sides of the river close to the water are covered with large willow trees, several species of which are to be met with in the Burman territory: it is termed manooka by the natives, and grows to the height of forty feet.

As the boats approached Miayng, a number of teak trees were seen on the left bank. People had been engaged in felling some of the largest and most valuable, and some were lying on the ground; no persons, however, came in sight. Proceeding to the island of Kaw-lung-geum, the bed of the river became full of pebbles. The island is low, and extends for a considerable distance, running N. and S.; at the southern extremity was a solitary hut, serving as a chokey. In some places here, the banks of the river were of a porous sandstone; in others low, shelving, and sandy. On the latter were found many turtles' eggs: alligators are numerons, solely of the snub-nosed kind. The ghurial has never been seen in the Burman rivers, although there were numerous traces of it in the fossil remains collected on the banks of the Irawadi.

The population on this island has received a great accession from the recent emigrations from the Burman side of the river. At the village of Kowlung, on the west side of the island, many boats were loading with cotton, and a large boat with salt from Moal Mein was lying at the ghat. Salt sells here for twenty rupees the vis. Abundance of wild poultry was caught in the woods adjacent by snares of thin cord. Eggs were brought for sale in considerable numbers. The distance of the village from Moal Mein may be estimated at thirty-five miles. The old village of Meayn, on the opposite bank, has been burnt and deserted.

16th March.—A forest of teak was visited on this day about a mile inland from Meayn; the trees were choaked with climbers and underwood, and varied in quality. The thengan, or canoe-tree, was plentiful: this is the next timber tree to the teak; the natives prefer it for boat-building; it is nearly allied to saul, and, like that tree, abounds in rosin or dammer. A curious kind of bamboo was also met with, the stem of which was elegantly marked longitudinally with white stripes. The hills in the vicinity are of the same description as those previously seen, one of them which was visited had several caves at the base, containing sonorous stalactites. The rock is said to yield but a small per-centage of pure lime, owing probably to the numerous veins of quartz by which it is traversed. On crossing over to the other side of the river, along which a thick jungle extended, recent tracks of elephants and tigers were distinctly perceptible: they do not seem, however, to be very numerous along this river, particularly as compared with the banks of the Attaran and Chappedong, where there is no moving ten paces without meeting with frequent vestiges of these animals. The villagers here entertain no dread them, and say that the tiger rarely attacks an individual unless he enters the jungle alone. The elephants are formidable to the cultivation only; but until they are very much thinned, or driven to a distance, it will be vain to attempt agricultural operations to any extent.

From this place the Yung-salen channel is distant three days' journey, and from thence to the Yenbyean Khari, one day; beyond which it is hardly possible even for small canoes to pass, on account of the rapids and rocks by which the course of the stream is interrupted.

Four miles from the Karean village opposite to Kow Lung island, and spreading to the bank of the river, is the largest forest of teak that occurs thus far upon the San-luen. The bank here is very lofty and precipitous, and crumbling, in consequence of which the substrata are exposed. The upper soil was of the same kind as previously noticed, and rested on coarse quartz, sand, and clay, stongly impregnated with iron as it descended. The forest runs a considerable way inland, and contains a number of valuable trees, although their growth is impeded by underwood and climbing plants. The greatest length of undivided stem was forty-seven feet; the girth below nine feet seven inches, and at the top five. Trees, with a girth of eleven or twelve feet at the usual place of measurement, are generally divided at a low height into two main branches.

From this place the party returned to Moal Mein, which was reached on the forenoon of the 18th March.*

* From the Calcutta Gov. Gazette.

PROVERB OF MEIDANI.

إِنَّ مِن البَيَانِ لَسِحْرًا

" There is often something magical in Eloquence."

This was said by the prophet when he received a deputation consisting of Amru ben Ahtem, Zibrikan ben Bedr, and Kais ben Asem. The apostle of God having inquired of Amru his opinion of Zibrikan, he replied, "he is a man obeyed by all who approach him, full of energy, courageously defending all who place themselves under his protection." "Apostle of God," exclaimed Zibrikan, "this man is able to say much more in my praise, but he suppresses it through jealousy." "Well then," resumed Amru, "he is a person of slender generosity, whose stables are narrow, who has a stupid father and a selfish uncle. O apostle of God, my first portrait was not a false one, and my second is true. But this is my character: when I am pleased with a man, I say all the good of him I know; when I am provked, I declare without reserve whatever is hateful in him." "Truly," said the prophet thereupon, "in eloquence there is often something magical:" that is, eloquence often produces the same effects as magic.

ON THE STRUCTURE OF THE HINDUSTANI LANGUAGE.

(From a Correspondent.)

Our connexion with the East has rendered the cultivation of oriental literature in this country a matter of considerable importance, if not of absolute necessity. Our splendid and opulent empire in Asia equals in extent one-third, and in population two-thirds, of Enrope; the languages of our Asiatic subjects have, therefore, a claim upon our attention, not merely as a nation superior in knowledge and liberality, but also in a political point of view. From England the Mussulman and the Hindū look for protection; to England they make their complaint when injured; and it is incumbent on our countrymen in India to know the language in which these complaints may be uttered.

For this reason, we present the readers of this journal with a brief sketch of the formation of the Hindūstanī, the most modern and at the same time the most general of the Indian dialects. Although ten or twelve different dialects are spoken in the various provinces of India, still the Hindūstanī is, from peculiar circumstances, understood and employed as the medium of communication with strangers throughout the whole country. The very name Hindūstanī, or Hindī, implies the wide range of territory over which it is more or less known. The other dialects of India, such as the Bengalī, the Tamul, &c., are confined to particular provinces; whereas the Hindī denotes the Lingua Franca, or general language of the country. How this language came to passess such an ascendancy, we shall now proceed to explain.

When the Mussulmans first invaded Hindustan, the languages there spoken were either the Sanscrit, or some of its cognate and derivative dialects, which differed most widely from that of the usurpers. After a lapse of time, however, the necessary intercourse between the conquerors and the conquered gave rise to a new language, at once elegant and simple, like a Grecian structure on a Gothic base. It was formed in almost equal proportions from the Arabic and Persian, the learned and current languages of the victors, on one part, and the Sanscrit or native dialects on the other. From being at first the language of the camp (urdū zabān), it gradually recommended itself so as to be spoken at the court of the illustrious Akbar, and thence it was diffused through the various provinces of his well-governed dominions. Thus the Hindustani became, and has since continued, the medium of communication between the natives of India and their rulers. Hence, in every town and village in India, there are found some who are acquainted with it, whatever may be the dialect peculiar to such places. It is still used as the current language of the camp, and has become (more or less corrupted) the common channel of conversation between the natives and their European masters.

A language thus formed, and spoken by so many people of different provincial dialects, must be subject to numberless varieties, not only in its idiom but even in the use of words. Like the English, which was brought into its present state under similar circumstances (the Nomana conquest, and the consequent introduction of the French language into Britain), the Hindustani seems to admit words ad libitum from other languages. In every province, those who speak it are found more or less to qualify it, as it were, with words and phrases from the dialect peculiar to that province. The religious tenets of the Mahomedaus and Hindus, and their pious aversion to each other, have so far affected the language as to divide it into two separate dialects, dialects, similar indeed in grammatical construction, but differing toto coolo in the use of words, and in particular of the nouns and adjectives. The Arabic being the sacred language of Islamism, and the Persian the polite or court dialect of the Mahomedan princes in India, it would naturally follow, that the language of the Mussulmans, to which the term Hindüstani, Hindi, Urdū, and Rekhta, are applicable, would abound with words and phrases from the Persian and Arabic; and we find, accordingly, that such Hindüstani works as have been translated from these languages, or originally composed by Mussulmans, are indebted for at least half their words to the above-mentioned tongues. Of this fact the Persian scholar may easily convince himself by perusing the elegant motto prefixed to the Hindüstani Grammar of Mr. Shakespear, being two couplets from a Mahomedan poet, in which every noun and adjective (to the number of fifteen) is either Arabic or Persian, thus:

In Hindūstanī there are numerous works by Mussulman writers, of which it will be sufficient to notice the poets Sauda, Wulce, Yaqeen, and Dard, each of whom has written a Dīwan, in imitation of the Persian poets, together with several miscellaneous pieces. The elegy of Miskin on the death of Mūslim is also a beautiful specimen of the Zabin-i-rekhta. The Khirud Afroz, a translation of Pilpay's Fables, from the Persian, is, according to the late Capt. J. Roebuck, the finest piece of prose composition in the language. To this we may add the Araish-i-Mūhfil, of which copious extracts have been given by Mr. Shakespear in his Hindūstanī selections; the Nissa-i-Chakār darwesh, translated from the Persian; and various other works too numerous to come within the compass of this essay. We may further add, that the Mahomedan writers generally use the Persic-Arabic character, seldom the Nagaree or Sanscrit alphabet.

The grand repository of the Hindū religion is the Sanscrit; and the various dialects of the Hindūs are more or less remotely derived from that source. Such of them as speak the Hindūstanī, or rather the Hindūwī (the term generally applied to the dialect of the Hindūs), are much more sparing in the use of words from the Arabic or Persian, in lieu of which they borrow freely from the Sanscrit, or its offspring dialects. They also use the Nagaree alphabet, which, though extremely philosophic, is much more unweildy than the alphabet of the Mussulmans. Such works as have been translated from the Sanscrit, as the Prem Sagur, the Baitūl pachīsī, and the Singhūsan Būtīsī, &c., are in the Hindūwī idiom. Of the last two works, extracts are given in Mr. Shakespear's selections, which extracts, we may add, are in the Nagaree or proper character.

Thus arose two principal dialects of the modern languages of India, bearing to each other the same relation as two ships, of which the bulwarks of the one were formed of oak, and those of the other of teak; but of which the internal construction, rigging, size, &c., are the same. The main difference between the Hindūstanī and Hindūwī consists in the use of the nouns and adjectives, the verbs being for the most the same in both. The student ought, however, to make himself acquainted with each of them, that he may be able, on an emergency, to suit his discourse to the capacity of his hearers; but it he will make a choice, we are strongly inclined to consider the Mahomedan dialect as the most useful, and, at the same time, the most elegant.

Such being the present state of the Hindustani language, we need not say that a knowledge of it is of the utmost importance to every individual who visits India. It is as necessary for him as an acquaintance with the English language is to a foreigner destined to spend a portion of his life in Great Britain. We may still further extend this simile, in order to show that, of all the languages spoken in India, the Hindustani is the most necessary. Let us suppose that a foreigner is told that, in the course of some six or nine months. he is to remove to some undetermined part of the British dominions, it may he Middlesex, Wales, or Lochaber: would not that foreigner, as a preparatory sten (we take it for granted that he would deem some such step necessary), learn the English language, which is understood throughout the British isles. in preference to the Celtic dialects of Wales or Scotland? In like manner, those whose prospects lead them to Hindustan, should, in the first place, acquire a tolerable knowledge of the general language of that country; and if afterwards their time will permit them, they may study other useful dialects, such as the Bengalī, the Tamul, &c. In short, what the English language would be to a native of Asia sojourning in Britain or North America, the Hindūstanī is to our adventurous countrymen who reside in India. As the English is known in every district within the British isles, so is the Hindustani more or less understood from Cape Comorin to the borders of Bucharia; and from the mouths of the Indus to the banks of the Burrumputer; over an extent of a million of square miles, and amidst a population of a hundred millions of souls.

There is a third variety of the language in question, too important to be entirely omitted here. We allude to what is vulgarly called the Moors, or Jargon of Hindūstan. This simple dialect is spoken in its purity between Europeans and their native servants in Calcutta and Bombay. It is nothing more than Hindustani stripped of its genders, inflections, &c., and the pronunciation of the words smoothed down so as to suit English organs of utterance and hearing. Till of late, most of the Europeans who sojourned in India learned the language by the car; a method by no means the most unerring. In conversing with the natives around them, however, they acquired so much of it as to be able to make themselves intelligible. Their pronunciation, we can easily fancy (for we have heard ample specimens of it), was none of the most correct; but then their hearers were either too polite or too servile to find fault with it, and would naturally address them in the same style, in return, not merely as a compliment to the superior taste and judgment of their masters, but as thereby having the best chance of making themselves understood. Thus, we believe, originated the Moors, a dialect likely to maintain its ground in Calcutta and other parts of India, where there is a general intercourse with Europeans. But before we quit the subject of the classic idiom, let us endeavour to do it justice by placing it in its true light.

It has been asserted by many individuals of high respectability, who have resided in India, that the Moors is not only the current and most useful language there, but that pure bona fide Hindūstanī would not be understood. We can only state, in reply, we found from experience that the case is not so. It may as well be said that the inhabitants of Billingsgate cannot understand pure sterling English; or that a foreigner coming among us should, in order to be understood, learn only the slang of the fishwomen who reside in that famous quarter. We admit that a person may spend years in India and make the Moors sufficient for communication with his servants; but suppose he has to converse with the higher classes of the natives, what a despicable figure he must cut in their eyes! This being the case, it will be needless for us to assure our youthful countrymen, destined for India, that the study of this slang dialect is not only useless, but pernicious, as the speaking of it will considerably lower them in the eyes of those with whom they converse. Let them then study the language on grammatical principles, which we may observe is an easier task than the acquisition of any of the modern European languages taught at our schools. They will thus be able to address those whom they are appointed to command and protect at once like men of rank and education. The natives of Hindūstan are by for means insensible to correctness of speech, which forms the subject of the motto before quoted, and with the translation of which we conclude our essay.—"The wise study eloquence; by eloquence the fame of the virtuous is exalted; let heroes appreciate eloquence, for it will establish their renown on a firm foundation."

F.

ODE.

From the Persian of Hafiz.*

Morn advances from her bowers, Decked with blushing vernal flowers, Bring the morning draught divine, Hither boy! the wine! the wine!

Dew-drops trickle from the check Of the tulip fair and sleek; Come, ye cheerful friends of mine, Hither bring the wine, the wine.

Gales of Eden gently blow, While our streams of ruby flow; Ever pour the draught divine, Wine for ever! sparkling wine!

See ye not the Bulbul's love Spreads her green throne in the grove? Then let liquid ruby shine, Hither, boy! the wine! the wine!

Strange that at such joyous hour Closed should be the banquet door! Must I here impatient wait? Open, keeper! ope the gate!

Ye who love, come hasten here, Drink the draught so pure and clear; Ye to whom high Wisdom's given, Stay, and offer vows to Heaven.

From a nymph of Paradise, On whose cheek enchantment lies, Drink, like me, a draught divine, Kisses drink, as sweet as wine.

* From a collection of poems by Mr. H. L. V. Derozio, an Indo-Briton, published at Calcutta, 1 vol. 12mo. 1827.

Review of Books.

Narrative of a Journey through the Upper Provinces of India, from Calcutta to Bombay, 1824-5 (with Notes upon Ceylon); an Account of a Journey to Madras and the Southern Provinces, 1826; and Letters written in India. By the late Right Rev. REGINALD HEBEB, D.D., Lord Bishop of Calcutta. London, 1828. Two vols. 4to.

The late Bishop Heber was a man eminently fitted by his temperament, and general character, for the important station he occupied in India. If his peculiar qualifications for it had not been appreciated antecedently to his departure for his vast diocese, the volumes before us would bear ample testimony to them. That such a man should be prematurely removed from a sphere where his talents promised such a harvest of good hereafter, is one of those mysteries in the dispensations of Providence to which we must bow with silent submission.

As we are denied the benefits which might have been anticipated from the sincere and diligent application of such talents as Dr. Heber's, improved by early culture, recommended by modesty and candour, adorned with unaffected piety, and ripened by experience, we eagerly seize upon the incipient fruits of his observation, and regard them with a kind of awe, or at least affection. This sentiment, which will approve the retention of many passages in these vote acculated to increase their bulk rather than our knowledge, should not carry us too far: in proportion as our partiality is excited in favour of a writer, there, is danger that his errors (for none are privileged from error) may mislead us.

It is not one of the least misfortunes which we deplore in the early death of Dr. Heber, that the opinions he had formed before experience and familiarity with the languages and natives of India had matured them, should appear before the world just as they were penned, without even his own last corrections. It is judiciously observed by a Calcutta writer, upon some of the remarks contained in the Bishop's letters, which were published about a year ago, that notions, cursorily formed and imparted upon the first glance, will, as coming from such a person, be received as authority, whether right or wrong, and may occasionally lead to inaccurate conclusions respecting India. Bearing in mind that the Bishop had been but two years and a half in India at the period of his death; that his journal and correspondence commence immediately on his arrival; that he was imperfectly acquainted with the native tongues; and that he was precluded by his high clerical character from close intercourse with certain classes of the people; we shall not wonder that he sometimes erred through misinformation: although the observations he had the opportunity of making in his extensive journey through the upper provinces, hasty as they were, gave him a far better insight into the real state of things than he could have gained by a residence of several years within the precincts of the Mahratta Ditch, by virtue of which some individuals assume a title to dogmatize upon Indian topics.

We are informed by Mrs. Heber, the widow of the late Bishop, who is the editor of this work, and who displays abundant marks of an elegant and cultivated mind, that although written in the shape of a diary, the greater part of the work formed his correspondence with herself; and that "had it pleased God to spare the Bishop's life, it was his intention, after revisiting the same countries, to publish; corrected by further experience, an account of his travels Anatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149.

40

from

from the notes, in which light only he considered the work now offered to the world." We here have a precautionary notice, that the observations were hasty and unprepared for the public eye, and that the Bishop was sensible of the need of further observation before he could trust their accuracy.

A candid and sensible man, like Dr. Heber, can make but few essential mistakes, however, except where he trusts to the representations of others, as he was sometimes forced to do. One error he has committed is indeed remarkable, because the matter lay within his own personal observation, and he has founded upon it a sort of accusation against certain individuals; namely, his confounding the Vidyalaya with the Sanscrit College, which the reader will see pointed out in p. 368 of our present volume.

In our review of this work, we shall endeavour to follow a methodical course, by arranging the opinions and reflections of the Bishop under distinct heads. Previous to which, however, it will be desirable to furnish the reader with a few specimens of the descriptive portions, which, though evidently written without study, are as remarkable for their easy and agreeable style, as the remarks occasionally intermixed denote the amiable character of the writer.

Calcutta has been so often described, that we can hardly expect any new traits. The Bishop's journal contains a variety of small incidents pleasingly related, which familiarize us with the aspect of the "city of palaces." His picture of the native quarter, in a letter to Miss Dod, is amusing:

There are some mosques of pretty architecture, and very neatly kept, and some pagodas, but mostly ruinous and decayed, the religion of the people being chiefly conspicuous in their worship of the Ganges, and in some ugly painted wooden or plaster idols, with all manner of heads and arms, which are set up in different parts of the city. Fill up this outline with a crowd of people in the streets, beyond any thing to be seen even in London, some dressed in tawdry silks and brocades, more in white cotton garments, and most of all black and naked, except a scanty covering round the waist, besides figures of religious mendicants with no clothing but their long hair and beards in elf locks, their faces painted white or yellow, their beads in one ghastly lean hand, and the other stretched out like a bird's claw to receive donations; marriage processions, with the bride in a covered chair, and the bridegroom on horseback, so swathed round with garlands as hardly to be seen; tradesmen sitting on the ground in the midst of their different commodities, and old men, lookers-on, perched naked as monkeys on the flat roofs of the houses; carts drawn by oxen and driven by wild-looking men with thick sticks, so unmercifully used as to undeceive perfectly all our notions of brahminical humanity; attendants with silver maces, pressing through the crowd before the carriage of some great man or other; no women seen except of the lowest class, and even these with heavy silver ornaments on their dusky arms and ancles; while coaches, covered up close with red cloth, are seen conveying the inmates of the neighbouring seraglios to take what is called "the air;" a constant creaking of cart wheels, which are never greased in India, a constant clamour of voices, and an almost constant thumping and jingling of drums, cymbals, &c. in honour of some of their deities; and add to all this , a villainous smell of garlic, rancid coco-nut oil, sour butter, and stagnant ditches, and you will understand the sounds, sights, and smells of what is called the "Black Town" of Calcutta.

The Bishop set out upon his visitation in June 1824; he embarked on the Hooghly, and having first visited Dacca, he thence retrograded and navigated the Ganges in his progress to Upper India as far as that river would admit.

His account of Benares is highly curious. The Bishop visited the temples, the college, the observatory, the schools, and was admitted by special favour into a Jain temple, of great reputed sanctity; the high-priest is himself regarded as an incarnation of the deity. The Jains of Benares (who are held in details) tation by the Hindus, and are themselves divided into two sects, who abhor each other, and recently fought in the streets) are extremely jealous of their religious mysteries, and had never been known to admit strangers to the penetralia of their temple. This vast city, which contains near 600,000 souls, is a noble place, thickly studded with domes and minarets. The Bishop gives the following description of it:

In our way to and from the school I had an opportunity of seeing something of Benares, which is a very remarkable city, more entirely and characteristically Eastern than any which I have yet seen, and at the same time altogether different from any thing in Rengal. No Europeans live in the town, nor are the streets wide enough for a wheelcarriage. Mr. Frazer's gig was stopped short almost in its entrance, and the rest of the way was passed in tonjons, through alleys so crowded, so narrow, and so winding, that even a tonjon sometimes passed with difficulty. The houses are mostly lofty, none I think less than two stories, most of three, and several of five or six, a sight which I now for the first time saw in India. The streets, like those of Chester, are considerably lower than the ground-floors of the houses, which have mostly arched rows in front, with little shops behind them. Above these, the houses are richly embellished with verandahs, galleries, projecting oriel windows, and very broad and overhanging eaves, supported by carved brackets. The number of temples is very great, mostly small and stuck like shrines in the angles of the streets, and under the shadow of the lofty houses. Their forms, however, are not ungraceful, and they are many of them entirely covered over with beautiful and claborate carvings of flowers, animals, and palm-branches, equalling in minuteness and richness the best specimens that I have seen of Gothic or Grecian architecture. The material of the buildings is a very good stone from Chunar, but the Hindoos here seem very fond of painting them a deep red colour, and, indeed, of covering the more conspicuous parts of their houses with paintings in gaudy colours of flower-pots, men, women, bulls, elephants, gods and goddesses, in all their many-formed, many-headed, many-handed, and many-weaponed varieties. The sacred bulls devoted to Siva, of every age, tame and familiar as mastiffs, walk lazily up and down these narrow streets, or are seen lying across them, and hardly to be kicked up (any blows, indeed, given them must be of the gentlest kind, or woe be to the profane wretch who braves the prejudices of this fanatic population) in order to make way for the tonjon. Monkeys sacred to Hunimaun, the divine ape who conquered Ceylon for Rama, are in some parts of the town equally numerous, clinging to all the roofs and little projections of the temples, putting their impertinent heads and hands into every fruiterer's or confectioner's shop, and snatching the food from the children at their meals. Faqueer's houses, as they are called, occur at every turn, adorned with idols, and sending out an unceasing tinkling and strumming of vinas, biyals, and other discordant instruments, while religious mendicants of every Hindoo sect, offering every conceivable deformity, which chalk, cow-dung, disease, matted locks, distorted limbs and disgusting and hideous attitudes of penance can shew, literally line the principal streets on both sides. The number of blind persons is very great (I was going to say of lepers also, but I am not sure whether the appearance on the skin may not have been filth and chalk); and here I saw repeated instances of that penance of which I had heard much in Europe, of men with their legs or arms voluntarily distorted by keeping them in one position, and their hands clenched till the nails grew out at the backs. Their pitiful exclamations as we'passed, "Agha Sahib," "Topee Sahib," (the usual names in Hindostan for an European) "khana ke waste kooch cheez do," "give me something to eat," soon drew from me what few pice I had, but it was a drop of water in the ocean, and the importunities of the rest as we advanced into the city, were almost drowned in the hubbub which surrounded us.

In proceeding by dawk to Cawnpoor, the Bishop's party encountered a frightful storm of rain; which afforded an opportunity for observing the improvement of the higher classes of the Hindus in the virtue of hospitality, and the laxity of caste prejudices.

Our caravan continued to arrive during the day, which cleared up towards evening but not time enough to prevent all our bedding from being hopelessly wet through Meantime we were not quite without employment, since besides seeing our horses taken care of, we had all manner of complaints to adjudicate between the villagers, our servants and sepoys, and two companies more of sepoys who were also driven in to shell ter. I could not help feeling very uncomfortable about the Corries and their children. The people who came up said they had obtained shelter in the house of a zemindar, but whether a gig and palanqueen could get through the waters which were between us, was more than we could form a judgment of. At length, just as we had given them up and were sitting down to dinner, they arrived, happily all well, and having received a hospitable entertainment from the zemindar in question, at whose house they had asked permission to boil a little gruel for the children, and who had immediately invited them into a comfortable verandah, and, though a Hindoo, sent to purchase them a fowl and currie. The Archdeacon expressed much unwillingness to eat these in his house, knowing, he said, how strong a prejudice would, a few years since, have been excited against such a step. But on his saying, "Oh do not let us pollute your house," the good man returned an answer which, Mr. Corrie observed, shewed, more than most things, how fast caste was wearing away, "We have different customs, but are we not of the same flesh and blood?-My house is much honoured by your company."

The visit of the Bishop to Lucknow, and the interviews he had with the late king of Oude, are interesting and very agreeably related. The king he describes as a tall man, with good features, and a pleasing countenance, evidently once handsome; fond of dress and costly furniture; his manners very gentlemanly and elegant; an author, ambitious of literary fame, and acquainted with European mechanics, & c. The Bishop gives a pretty full relation of the circumstances which occurred at this court, and which are the subject of the "Oude Papers," of ponderous memory.* Hukeem Mehdee, the disgraced minister, lives in great splendour at Futtenghur. The reform in the revenue system, it appears, though pressed by Mr. Ricketts, the present resident, was still resisted by the king (on grounds, it must be confessed, not devoid of plausibility), and in the mean time this fine country is a prey to disorders of every kind; travellers and even the peasantry are obliged to go armed. Yet the Bishop found the country in a far better state of cultivation than he had expected to find it, which he supposes to be attributable to the withdrawing of the British troops, which were employed to enforce the unjust claims of the aumeens (government collectors), who have been either driven away entirely by the zemindars, or forced to agree to a moderate compromise. "From Lucknow to Sandee, where I am now writing," he observes, "the country is as populous and well cultivated as most of the Company's territories. It should be observed, however, that I have as yet seen no sign of those mud forts, stockades, and fortresses, on which the zemindars and peasantry are said to rely for safety; and that though I have heard a good deal all the way of the distressed state of the country, as well as its anarchy and lawlessness, except in a single instance, I have seen no signs of either. I cannot but suspect, therefore, that the misfortunes and anarchy of Oude are somewhat overrated, though it is certain that so fine a land will take a long time in ruining, and that very many years of oppression will be required to depopulate a country which produces on the same soil, and with no aid but irrigation, crops of wheat and pulse every year."

Upon reaching Delhi, in fact all the way from Meerut to that city, he finds the people in less apparent comfort than those of Oude: they were looking half-starved and broken-hearted, and the cultivation was of the most slovenly kind. This distress, however, appears to have arisen from the existing drought: they had had not above three slight showers during the preceding twelve months.

The edifices and other curiosities of Delhi, the court, the emperor, to whom the Bishop was presented, are subjects which are copiously treated of in the work, but we have not space enough to dwell upon them.

The Bishop's journey into the hilly country (as far as Almorah), and into Rajpootana, brings him amongst people and scenes not often described, and this part of his diary is therefore perhaps the most interesting. From the heights of the nearer range of the Himalaya, he had a view of those "glorious objects," the most elevated peaks in the world. Nundidevi, the loftiest, which is 25,689 feet above the level of the sca, is forty miles distant from Almorah, as the crow flies; it is the subject of one of the beautiful plates, from drawings of the Bishop, which decorate the work. The scenery is scantily described in the diary, evidently from the difficulty of transferring immediately to paper the peculiar and sublime emotions which such objects excite. Had he lived to complete his projected work, Dr. Heber's picture of this magnificent scenery would probably have been eloquent.

The Bishop's description of some of the curiosities of Umeer will afford the reader an idea of the yet undepicted wonders of Rajpootana. He expresses his surprise that a place so curious and interesting should be so little known, not merely in Europe but in India:—

This road led us through an ancient gate-way in an embattled and turretted wall which connected the two hills. like that which I described on the other side of Jyepoor. and within we found a street like that also, of temples and old buildings of the same character, one of which was pointed out to me as a shrine whither the young Raja is carried weekly to pay his devotions, and another as the house where he puts up his horses and reposes on such occasions. Beyond was a still steeper ascent to a second gate, which introduced us to a very wild and romantic valley, with a small lake at the bottom,-the crests of the hills on either side crowned with walls and towers, their lower parts all rock and wood interspersed with ruined buildings, in front, and on the margin of the lake, a small ruinous town, overgrown with trees, and intermingled with towers and temples, and over it, but a little to the left hand, a noble old fortified palace, connected by a long line of wall and tower with a very large castle on the highest part of the hill. We now descended the ghât by a similar road to that which had conducted us thither, among some fine old trees, fragments of rock, and thickets of thorny underwood, till we reached the town, which almost entirely consisted of temples, and had few inhabitants but grim and ghastly Yogis, with their hair in elf-knots, and their faces covered with chalk, sitting naked and hideous, like so many ghoules, amid the tombs and ruined houses. A narrow winding street led us through these abodes of superstition, under a dark shade of peepul-trees, till we found ourselves on another steep ascent paved with granite and leading to the palace. We wound along the face of the hill, through, I think, three Gothic gateways, alighted in a large moss-grown quadrangle surrounded by what seemed to be barracks and stables, and followed our guides up a broad and long flight of steps, through another richly ornamented gateway, into the interior courts of the building, which contain one very noble hall of audience, a pretty little garden with fountains, and a long succession of passages, cloisters, alcoves, and small and intricate apartments, many of them extremely beautiful, and enjoying from their windows, balconies, and terraces, one of the most striking prospects which can be conceived. The carving in stone and marble, and the inlaid flowers and ornaments in some of these apartments, are equal to those at Delhi and Agra, and only surpassed by the beauties of the Tage-mahal. My companiors, none of whom had visited Umeer before, all declared that, as a whole, it was superior to the castle of Delhi. For myself, I have seen many royal palaces containing larger and more stately rooms,—many, the architecture of which was in a purer taste, and some which have covered a greater extent of ground (though in this, if the fortress on the hill be included, Umeer will rank, I think, above Windsor)—but for varied and picturesque effect, for richness of carving, for wild beauty of situation, for the number and romantic singularity of the apartments, and the strangeness of finding such a buildang in such a place and country, I am able to compare nothing with Umeer; and this, too, was the work of Jye Singh!

Some amusing particulars are given of the Guzerattees and the court of Baroda; but they are too diffuse for quotation. The characteristics of the various native courts visited by the Bishop appear to have been seized by him with great adroitness.

It is time for us, however, to terminate this desultory manner of reviewing the work, and consider the author's opinions upon certain topics of primary importance, which occur in various parts of it.

The first topic which we shall notice, is one more immediately relating to the province of the author, namely, the state of religion in India. The indifference of Europeans to religion and religious improvement is spoken of in some parts of his diary, especially at Dinapoor, in no measured terms by the Bishop, and he laments the disputes and "absurd tracasseries" in the church in Southern India: yet in another part of his work he says, "in almost every part of my journey I have found the minds of the Europeans more favourably disposed to religion than I expected."

The real extent reached by the ministers of Christianity, missionaries or otherwise, in their endeavours at converting the natives is no where distinctly stated in the Bishop's work. He appears to have received on this, as well as other topics, different impressions at different periods, and as he had no opportunity to review his sentiments, expressed thus hastily and partially, and to give a summary of them, it is difficult to arrive at a satisfactory result. In a letter to Mr. Wynn (vol. ii. p. 373), he says that the converts who are members of the church of England in the presidency of Bengal do not exceed in number 500 adults at most, a large proportion of whom are the wives of European soldiers. The native Christians of the Roman Catholic persuasion, he was informed, amounted to some thousands, but these, he says, do not bear a good character. Again, in a letter to the Rev. Mr. Blunt (vol. ii. p. 414) he observes, "the labours of our missionaries in those parts of India which I have seen have not as yet produced any great or striking show of converts." He adds, that in the south, the number of native Christians, excluding the Syrian and Romish churches, is reckoned at from 40,000 to 50,000, a number, however, which he reduces in a subsequent letter to below 15,000. He speaks, indeed (from the report of a native missionary), of the Abbé Dubois' "mendacity and ignorance, even with regard to Malabar and Coromandel," as surpassing credit (ii. 342); and elsewhere he mentions "the good which in a quiet and unpretending way is really doing amongst these poor people," especially by native missionaries. The Bishop has spoken distinctly upon one point, namely, the way, "the best and safest way," in which missions ought to be conducted in India, namely, "as the work of private persons alone, and although not forbidden, in no degree encouraged, by Government:" and again, "all that seems necessary for the best effects to follow is, to let things take their course, to make the missionaries discreet, to keep the government, as it now is, strictly neuter, and to place our confidence in a general diffusion of knowledge, and in making ourselves really useful to the 1828.7

temporal as well as spiritual interests of the people among whom we live."

There is a palpable inconsistency between these declarations, which occur not in the diary, but in the correspondence, and the occasional complaints in the work that the local government do not permit native converts to fill offices which give them a power over their countrymen: a rule, the adherence to which seems to us indispensable in order to keep them free, in the eyes of the natives, from suspicion of giving indirect and secret encouragement to missionary labours. When therefore Dr. Heber speaks of the "absurd, not to say wicked," act of Government in removing from his regiment a naick who had embraced Christianity, "though they still allow him his pay;" and stigmatizes the government of Madras as "lukewarm and cowardly." because in a regulation of 1816, respecting the appointment of district munsiffs, it is provided (in strict consonance with the principle applauded by him), that "nonative shall be authorized to officiate in that office, unless he be of the Hindoo or Mahomedan persuasion;" we again have cause to lament that he did not live to reconcile these discordant views of the same subject. We say nothing of the special ground upon which this regulation is supposed, by the writer himself, to be founded, namely, that the native Christians in the south of India "belong to a lower caste of Indians, for even these Christians retain many prejudices of caste, and in point of knowledge and morality are said to be extremely inferior" to the other natives. It seems to us obvious that, whilst caste prejudices and other superstitious feelings are still so tenaciously adhered to amongst the Hindus that even Christians cannot altogether emancipate themselves therefrom, the Government, by suffering a native convert, who by becoming so forfeits caste, to fill any office which gives him control over his unconverted brethren, would violate that very rule of strict neutrality which the Bishop so repeatedly and forcibly prescribes.

Whilst at Benares, the Bishop became acquainted with and has candidly stated the extent to which nominal or spurious conversion is carried amongst the natives of India; his eyes, he tells us, were there opened more fully to a danger, which had before struck him as possible, that some of the boys brought up in our schools might grow up accomplished hypocrites, playing the part of Christians whilst zealous followers of Brahma. "A man may believe what he pleases; nay, I understand, he may almost say what he pleases, without the danger of losing caste; and so long as they are not baptized, neither eat nor drink in company with Christians or Pariahs, all is well in the opinion of the great majority even in Benares." In a letter to Mr. Wilmot Horton, he says that, "instances of actual conversion to Christianity are as yet very uncommon." Even in Ceylon, where "Christianity has made, perhaps, a greater progress than in all India besides," the Bishop confesses to Mr. Wynn, that the converts, "Christians as they are, have preserved very many of their ancient usages, particularly with regard to caste, which in Ceylon, as well as in many parts of Southern India, is preserved (he says) with a ficrceness which I have rarely witnessed in Bengal, and which divides almost as perfectly a Soodra from a Pariah Christian, as it did the same individuals whilst worshippers of Vishnu and Siva. The high-caste Indians, for instance, had made one most abominable claim, to have a separate cup for the sacrament!" Who can regard such a compromise between Christianity and Hinduism as real conversion? Who, that tolerates such customs, regarding them as "merely civil questions of pedigree and worldly distinction," can, at the same time, quarrel with the complaisance of the Abbé Dubois?

It must be acknowledged that the Bishop speaks of many symptoms occurring to himself as well as to others, of a considerable change operating in the Hindu mind; of a growing contempt of idolatry, and an anxiety after other forms of belief, which give the Musulmans many converts. The very indifference of the influential men amongst the natives to the measures employed for extending Christianity, and rendering it more conspicuous in Hindustan, their placing schools under the charge and direction of missionaries, shews, as the Bishop remarks, "how completely those feelings are gone by, in Bengal at least, which made even the presence of a single missionary the occasion of tumult and alarm." He adds, however, even here: "I only hope that no imprudence or over-forwardness on our part will revive these angry feelings." The desire of the wealthy natives to imitate the English in many particulars of dress, buildings, domestic economy, is elsewhere adverted to as indicating that "a change, either for good or evil, of a most extensive and remarkable nature is fermenting in the native mind." May the tokens be for good!

One important opinion is expressed in the Bishop's correspondence, which ought not to be overlooked by the advocates of Indian missions at home: "I will only add, that the more I see of India (this was written in May 1825), the more I am convinced that its conversion will be best accomplished by the agency of natives of the country, and that we have already reached the moment when it will be no longer desirable to incur the expense of sending out missionaries from Europe." The custom of street-preaching in India the Bishop condemns (vol. i. p. 299), as not only unnecessary, but unsafe.

The schools are admitted to excite no jealousy; the common people send their children "not only without objection, but with great thankfulness;" this has been owing, Dr. Heher states, to our disclaiming all direct attempts to convert the children. Hence no objection is made to the use of the Old and New Testament, as a class book, and Brahmins as well as Musulmans stand by with perfect coolness, and sometimes listen with apparent interest, whilst the scholars read our scriptures. This passiveness affords a most convenient means of furnishing the natives with a dispassionate view of the principles of Christianity; and it has arisen from not forcing upon them our tenets. The Bishop has adverted to the gross mismanagement of the school at Cawnpore (vol. i. p. 365), supported by private subscription aided from the funds of Government.

On the subject of suttees, the Bishop evidently writes under the influence of his existing state of feeling on the subject. In some places he speaks of it as a practice which might be put down without exciting any disturbance; in others he includes suttees amongst those religious observances, a direct interference with which, on the part of Government, would lead to dangerous results; and says that on this as well as other points a change for the better is silently taking place in the public mind "if we are not in too great a hurry." Until that change shall take place, it is preposterous to talk of attempting to put a stop to suttees, which would only render the practice secret. Many arguments in favour of compulsory measures against this custom are deduced from the success of Major Walker, in respect to infanticide in Guzerat. What says the Bishop? " through the influence of Major Walker, it is certain that many children were spared; since that time, however, things have gone on very much in the old train, and the answers made by the chiefs to any remonstrances of the British officers is, 'pay our daughters' marriage-portions and they shall live."

Of the character of the natives of India, notwithstanding the heavy charges against against their inhumanity towards each other, and the practices growing out of their religious system, the Bishop speaks very favourably. "On the whole," he says, " they are a lively, intelligent, and interesting people. Their religion is indeed, a horrible one; far more so than I had conceived; it gives them no moral precepts; it encourages them in vice by the style of its ceremonies, and the character given of its deities; and by the institution of caste it hardens their hearts against each other to a degree which is often most revolting." Again: "their general character has much which is extremely pleasing to me; they are brave, courteous, intelligent, and most eager after knowledge and improvement, with a remarkable talent for the sciences of geometry, astronomy, &c." These remarks are applicable of course particularly to those Hindus more immediately under his own observation. The Rajpoots, whose character he was obliged to take at second-hand, are pourtrayed, very unjustly we believe, in the darkest colours: with the redeeming quality of conrage, "they have the vices of slaves added to those of robbers, with no more regard to truth than the natives of our own provinces, exceeding them in drunkenness, fondness for opium, and sensuality, while they have a bloodthirstiness from which the great mass of the Hindus are very far removed." The Bishop has expressed no scepticism in regard to this dark portrait of a people, painted by those who know them in very different colours: he should have called to mind (to use his own words) "how hard it is to gain in India accurate information as to facts which seem most obvious to the senses."

The treatment of women in India, as in other Eastern countries, is very repugnant to European delicacy:

I observed, by the way, that my chobdar and the rest of my escort, seemed to think that it was strange to give more to a woman than to most of the men; and I had noticed on many occasions, that all through India any thing is thought good enough for the weaker sex, and that the roughest words, the poorest garments, the scantiest alms, the most degrading labour, and the hardest blows, are generally their portion. The same chuprassee who, in clearing the way before a great man, speaks civilly enough to those of his own sex, cuffs and kicks any unfortunate female who crosses his path without warning or forbearance. Yet to young children they are all gentleness and indulgence. What riddles men are! and how strangely do they differ in different countries! An idle boy in a crowd would infallibly, in England, get his head broken, but what an outery would be raised if an unoffending woman were beaten by the satellites of authority! perhaps both parties might learn something from each other; at least I have always thought it very hard to see beadles, in England, lashing away children on all public occasions, as if curiosity were a crime at an age in which it is, of all others, most natural.

Of the architecture of the Hindus, Dr. Heber, in the extracts from his letters formerly published in this Journal, spoke slightingly. Further observation led him to recant, to a certain extent, his opinion. He speaks with admiration of the specimens of the art extant in Rajpootana (hitherto almost a terra incognita), and particularly in Chittore. He had evidently all along expected great things from the works at Elephanta; when he saw them he thus wrote: "though my expectations were highly raised, the reality much exceeded them, and both the dimensions, the proportions, and the sculpture, seemed to me to be of a more noble character, and a more elegant execution, than I had been led to suppose. Even the statues are executed with great spirit, and are some of them of no common beauty, considering their dilapidated condition and the coarseness of their material." This does not proceed from a mere traveller, but from a person of acknowledged taste and judgment, and once a Anatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149. convert 4 P convert to Mr. Mill's sceptical notions of Hindu art. In the extract to which we more particularly referred, the Bishop assumed, with Mr. Mill, that "the Hindoos took all their notions of magnificence from the models furnished by their Mahometan conquerors;" upon personally examining these relics, however, he finds he had been misled (as Mr. Mill has been) by "travellers who had seen little of India but Bombay." The erections were, he says, evidently Hindu, and dedicated to Siva; the style of ornament and proportions of the pillars, the dress of the figures, and all the other circumstances of the place, are such as may be seen at this day in every temple of central India, and among all those Indian nations where the fashions of the Musulmans have made but little progress."

The Bishop represents the people, high and low (excepting, for obvious reasons, the Musulmans), as generally well affected towards the Government. In the upper provinces, in Rajpootana, in the Deccan, he describes them as sensible of the benefits they have received from a government under which they enjoy the fruits of their industry without fear of the cruelties and exactions of their former rulers. In writing to Mr. Wilmot Horton, he says:—

I am assured that there is no ground whatever for the assertion, that the people are become less innocent or prosperous under British administration. In Bengal, at least in this neighbourhood, I am assured by the missionaries, who, as speaking the language, and associating with the lower classes, are by far the best judges, that the English Government is popular. They are, in fact, lightly taxed (though that taxation is clumsily arranged, and liable to considerable abuse, from the extortions of the native Aûmeens and Chokeydars); they have no military conscription, or forced services; they live in great security from the march of armies, &c.; and, above all, they some of them recollect in their own country, and all of them may hear or witness in the case of their neighbours in Oude and the Birman empire, how very differently all these things are managed under the Hindoo and Mahommedan sovereignties.

Of the starved and wretched condition of the natives not under British authority very lamentable statements appear in the work. The Bishop mentions the great increase of population in Bengal and Bahar, and the number of emigrants which come thither from all parts of India, amongst the proofs that our dominions are "on the whole, wisely and equitably governed." Where complaints occurred, they were mostly generated by some selfish feeling, as in the case of the Rawul of Banswarra, who allowed that ours was a good government for peace and for putting down robbery, but abominable for increasing the price of opium! The state of the peasantry, according to the Bishop, is by no means severe:

Rent is higher than I expected to find it; in this neighbourhood six rupets, about twelve shillings the English acre, seems an usual rate, which is a great sum among the Hindoos, and also when compared with the cheapness of provisions and labour, about sixpence being as much as a working man can earn, even as a porter, and three-pence being the pay of a labourer in husbandry, while ordinary rice is, at an average, less than a halfpenny for the weight of two pounds English. In consequence I do not apprehend that the peasantry are ill off, though, of course, they cannot live luxuriously. Fish swarm in every part of the river, and in every tank and ditch. During the wet months they may be scooped up with a handanet in every field, and procured, at all times, at the expense of a crooked nail and a little plaintain thread. They, therefore, next to rice and plaintains, constitute the main food of the country. Animal food all the lower castes of Hindoos eat whenever they can get it, beef and veal only excepted; but, save fish, this is not often in their power. Except food, in such a climate their wants are of course but few. Very little clothing serves, and even this is more worn from decency than necessity. They have no furniture, except a cane bedstead stead or two, and some earthen or copper pots; but they have a full allowance of silver ornaments, coral beads, &c., which even the lowest ranks wear to a considerable value, and which seem to imply that they are not ill off for the necessaries of life, when such superfluities are within their reach.

Taxation, he adds, is not high, and half of the amount is laid out upon public works. It must be confessed that the Bishop gives a deplorable account of the state of the peasants in Bahar and near Benares, which he attributes to the famous measure of Mr. Law, founded, he says, on an imperfect acquaintance with the interests of India.

The Bishop mentions in more than one passage the offensive behaviour of some Europeans towards the natives, who are not only excluded from our society, but "a bullying insolent manner is continually assumed in speaking of them." The difference of character in this respect between the French and the English made the former, though often avaricious and oppressive, greater favourites with the people; and Dr. Heber enumerates, as one of the obstacles to the popularity of our government, "the distance and haughtiness with which a very large proportion of the civil and military servants of the Company treat the upper and middling classes of natives." He instances specific acts of systematic rudeness offered to native functionaries of the Government, in the very teeth of the regulations. These things ought to be "reformed altogether," if we wish to bring about any approximation of the Hindu character to our own.

The Bishop has thought it worth while to touch upon the questions of the freedom of the press in India, deportation, and colonization: we subjoin his opinions upon each. On the first, he says: "on the whole, I think it still desirable that, in this country, the newspapers should be licensed by Government." With respect to deportation, he is convinced it is a power essential to the public peace. "Many of the adventurers," he adds, "who come hither from Europe, are the greatest profligates the sun ever saw; men whom nothing but despotism can manage, and who, unless they were really under a despotic rule, would insult, beat, and plunder the natives without shame or pity. Even now many instances occur of insult and misconduct, for which the prospect of immediate embarkation for Europe is the most effectual precaution or remedy. It is in fact the only control which the Company possesses over the tradesmen and ship-builders in Calcutta, and the indigo-planters up the country. As to colonization, he says: "the indigo planters are chiefly confined to Bengal, and I have no wish that their number should increase in India. They are always quarrelling with, and oppressing the natives, and have done much in those districts where they abound, to sink the English character in native eyes. Indeed the general conduct of the lower order of Europeans in India is such, as to shew the absurdity of the system of free colonization which W--- is mad about."

We here close our review of this very interesting work; it has reached a greater length than we anticipated, but its contents afford matter for even a much longer article.

Annotations on the Mutiny Act, 4th Geo. IV. cap. 81, with some Observations on the Practice of Courts Martial, both in his Majesty's and the East-India Company's Service. By Captain M'Naghten, late Deputy Judge Advocate General, Bengal Army. London, 1828. 8vo. pp. 242.

This work is, we believe, reprinted from a Calcutta edition, with considerable augmentations. Capt. M'Naghten's duties, whilst he held the post of deputy judge advocate general in Bengal, must have required him to pay frequent attention to the various matters comprehended in the mutiny laws. these annotations are the result of his reflections thereupon, and we may say, once for all, that his observations are shrewd and sensible. Other writers have recently treated upon the same subject, but, according to Capt. M'Naghten, not so as to render his work superfluous: on the contrary, he censures, rather unsparingly, the works of Col. Kennedy and Capt. Hough. The former, he observes, has "set out with the untenable assumption that martial law is vague and uncertain, in comparison with that which is, by excellence, termed the law of the land;" and has not taken for his text, as our author has done. the East-India Company's mutiny act, only introducing the other as occasion required, thereby directing his efforts to "the rendering more certain that particular branch of the law military by which the native army is controlled. and which requires to be more attentively treated in consequence of the infrequency with which it is brought to the notice of Parliament, and the apparent neglect with which it is then regarded." Capt. M'Naghten, indeed, is of opinion that the recent act for the Company's forces is drawn up with a very reprehensible degree of looseness.

Amongst the questions treated of in this work, which the author, in his dedication of it to the Duke of Wellington, specifies as novel, interesting, and undetermined, is the difference between cashicring and dismissal. On this subject Capt. M'Naghten expresses himself as follows:

This (cashiering) is the highest subordinate punishment that can be inflicted upon a commissioned officer; and when we reflect upon the severity of its nature, it must excite both our surprise and regret that it is so ill-defined, and so inconsistently applied, as I shall presently, and satisfactorily, show it to be. In the estimation of the world, it involves not only the destruction of rank, but the destruction of honour; and to ruin a man in the eyes of all who know him, it is only necessary to say, "he was cashiered by the sentence of a general court-martial." People who are not, and never have been, in the military service, consider cashiering as invariably the punishment inflicted on preeminent turpitude; and even the army has been instructed to rank it much higher than dismissal, in the graduated scale of martial severity. Every officer is, or should be, acquainted with the sentiments of Lord Hastings, who is acknowledged, I believe, to be one of the first, if not the very first, of military lawyers in the kingdom, as published to the army, on the trial of Major M- in January 1820, for signing false musters, and other various offences; and that his Lordship then laid it down as a rule, to be thereafter heeded, that cashiering included future disqualification to serve his Majesty or the East-India Company again, and that in so doing it differed from dismissal. This construction of the term being communicated to the court, caused a reply from them, explanatory of their reasons for considering the two punishments as synonymous in title, and similar in effect; but although they made it clearly enough appear, that almost all writers on the subject were wont to use the terms indiscriminately, and that even some formerly confirmed sentences bore them out in their opinion of the sameness of the punishment, yet no doubt can exist of their having been in error quant hocnamely, in not having applied the very word laid down in the Mutiny Act as the penalty for that particular offence, even without inquiring in what respect it differed from any other word. The court were wrong in having substituted any other phrase than that contained in the act; and although the Deputy Judge Advocate General, who conducted the trial (Captain Gavin Young), supported with much ability, and apparent reason, the use of the word dismissal, and the court to the last declared themselves unconvinced by the reasoning of his Lordship, it must be acknowledged, that as far as it went upon the necessity of following, on such occasions, the words of the act, that reasoning was quite irrefutable; while the experience and knowledge of his Lordship rendered it certain that his interpretation of the term cashiering was likewise in consumer with the practice of the law.

recorded

It must, however, be confessed, that confidence in the infallibility of his Lordship's judgment, is the strongest incentive an officer could have for mentally yielding to his position, though he had no alternative but to obey the mandate; because there is no part of the Mutiny Act which lays it down that cashiering involves a greater punishment than dismissal; not will it be of any avail to show, that whenever the former word is used, it is followed by "and shall be thereby utterly disabled," &c.; because if the term itself contains the disqualification, it is at least superfluous to make the addition; and, farther, because the same addition will be found attached in like manner to the other term. It is impossible for any one to learn from the Act itself, or from any work on military law, the now established distinction between cashiering and dismissal; and the French word casser, of which the former is, I conclude, the derivative, implies nothing more than breaking, or annulling, an officer's commission.

Towards the conclusion of the book, the author points out an inconsistency arising from the imperfect phraseology of one of the articles of war, which, whilst it only awards the penalty of discharge for the highest degree of moral turpitude, under felony, admits of an equally severe infliction against mere venial offences, nay a more severe, which is cashic.ing.

Upon the subject of duelling Capt. M'Naghten has suggested a plan which, we agree with him, is at all events a safe experiment. After pointing out the peculiar circumstances of this practice considered as a military offence, and the impossibility of dispensing with it in the army, unless a substitute be universally agreed to, he suggests the following:

In any sincere endeavours to supply existing defects, the civil and military laws must go together; but I shall first speak of pure military duelling, in which the principals and seconds are all amenable to military law, and all of whom, therefore, can be brought before a military tribunal. Let there be, by the enactment of the legislature, the necessary powers given for the establishment of a new court for the exclusive purpose of deciding in all cases of personal quarrels between officers, and which are not otherwise connected with the rules of discipline; as in the case of an inferior insulting his superior in the execution of his duty. Let these courts (under some significant denomination) be assembled, as circumstances may require, either by commanders in chief, commanders of divisions, or of regiments, battalions, detachments, and so fortly, and let their decision (this I hold to be a sine quá non) be unalterable by any other power, and not remissible as is that of a court-martial. Let the members be sworn, subject to challenge, and bound to secrecy of individual opinion, as is the custom at present; and, in a word, let it have the aid of all necessary formalities. I shall now suppose, that at the mess-table one officer has given the lie to another; that complaint is made to the commanding officer of the corps, who thereupon orders the court to assemble; and, lastly, that upon due investigation, the insulting expression is proved to have been unprovoked, undeserved, and in all respects wanton. Let the decree of the court (which in all possible cases should be laid down in the Articles of War) be, that the offender shall, in presence of every officer, then with the corps or detachment, read an expression of sorrow for his conduct, entreat the pardon of the offended party in particular, and of all in whose presence the outrage was committed; and let what he reads have been dictated, and drawn out by the court itself, and signed by the offender; and, finally, let it be recorded in the proper staff office (report of proceedings being made to head-quarters). and an authenticated copy of the decree given to the complainant for his lasting tatisfaction. In more aggravated cases, such as that of a blow wantonly struck, let the penitentiary confession be still more forcible in its terms, more public in its manner of being read, and let the offender read it on his knees. These are suppositions of the extrement cases: and for offences of a minor degree, it were easy to modify the manner and mensure of atonement. Like the existing laws the above would be useless, if adequate means were not taken to enforce them. Let, therefore, provision be made, that any officer so offended, who may decline calling upon the judgment of this court, and who may take any means whatsoever of redressing himself, be, upon due conviction thereof. before a general court-martial, irremissibly cashiered; and the same in regard to any officer refusing to submit to the judgment of the proposed court immediately and explicitly. Of course, if the investigation proved that the complainant was deserving, to any extent, of the obloquy put upon him, he, too, must be punishable, either by the apology being made reciprocally, or in a severer way, as the case might require; and if laws of the foregoing nature were formed, and rigidly executed, the decision of the suggested court would soon come to be considered as a sufficient purification of character. and no officer could think meanly of another, whom a body of officers pronounced undishonoured, such pronouncement being founded upon a sworn investigation into the facts of his case. On the contrary, an officer repeatedly offending would soon come to be universally despised and avoided, even if cashiering were not rendered the penalty of a repetition.

The expedient here suggested would have the certain effect of preventing duels; the question is, whether the army would adopt it voluntarily, for it would be a great stretch of authority for the crown to prescribe it. We think that a very small proportion of the officers of the army would consent to adopt a plan which vested others, in all cases, with the vindication of their honour, an office often too delicate to admit of being delegated.

Capt. M'Naghten is not an enemy to flogging, in certaing cases:

It is said, that a flogged soldier is good for nothing afterwards, but that an imprisoned one always comes out of confinement a better man than he went in. Supposing this to be true, it confines the argument strictly to the individual, and gives no insight into the comparative effects which the two punishments have on the minds of his companions; but I deny both the positions, because I speak from experience when I say, that I have known men who have been flogged to be in no degree deteriorated, and men who have been long confined, in no degree bettered, by the punishment; and I think that every person who has witnessed a corporal punishment must be able to call to memory what his sensations were on the first occasion of beholding it, and how strongly he felt, that if he were liable to such a penalty, he would tremblingly abstain from the perpetration of aught which could lead to its infliction. Such is the constant effect of a visible punishment on the spectators; but when a man is sentenced to imprisonment, his comrades lose sight of him forthwith: he is immured in a cell, and speedily forgotten.

We have not space to examine the work more fully, but it is well worthy the perusal of the army.

Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Freland.

April 19th, 1828.—The general meeting of the Society was held this day at 2 o'clock r.m.; the Right Hon. C. W. W. Wynn, president, in the chair. The following donations were laid on the table.

For the Library: from his Excellency Count Munster, Hanoverian Minister of State, F.M.R.A.S., a catalogue of the oriental MSS, in the Royal Library at Hanover. From the Marquis Fortia D'Urban, his Deux Discours composés pour la Société Asiatique; avec planches, &c. From Professor Middeldorpf, of Wratislaw, his works. entitled Cura Hexaplares in Johum; Commentationes de Prudentio, &c., two parts; and a Latin oration delivered on the anniversary of the King of Prussia's birth. From M. Théologue, F.M.R.A.S., a Greek treatise on church music. From M. Klaproth, F.M.R.A.S., his memoir on the Sources of the Brahmaputra and of the Irrawaddy with a map. From Professor Hamaker, F.M.R.A.S., the New Testament, in Sinchalese, 4to. From the Rev. J. Humbert, of Geneva; his Anthologie Arabe; and Discours sur l'utilité de la langue Arabe. From the Société de Géographie of Paris; Recueil de Voyages, vol. ii. From the Académie Royale des Sciences de Bordeaux. Séance publique de l'Academie du 31 Mai 1827. From Sir G. F. Staunton, Bart., V.P.R.A.S, the first and third numbers of the Canton Register. From Sir Alex. Johnston, V.P.R.A.S., a painting representing three Candian chiefs transferring the whole of the sea-coast of the island of Ceylon to Governor Falck, in 1766; a portrait of the chief who was prime minister to the King of Candy at the time the above-mentioned transfer was effected: both these paintings are connected with a very material political feature of the able and honourable administration of Emanuel Falck, the late Dutch Governor of Ceylon, and the cousin of the present Netherlands' ambassador in England. From Sir William Rumboldt, Bart., M.R.A.S., a portrait of the late Colonel Lambton, surveyor general of India. From Lieut, Colonel Tod, M.R.A.S., a MS, historical roll or chronicle of the Ghelote dynasty of princes of Méwar; this very curious and valuable MS, is written on linen, about eighteen inches wide, and of great length, as may be supposed, as it contains a brief detail of events from the establishment of the family in the peninsula of Saurashtra, in the second century, to Rana Juggut Sing, of Oudipoor, in the seventeenth; and every occurrence of importance in their annals finds here its pictorial delineation: if they do not possess much value as works of art, they must be allowed to be of considerable interest as records of their history and mythology, and even as representations of personal appearance and costume. Although the princes of Méwar, from the greater antiquity of their family, preserve more specimens of historical records, thus illustrated, than any other tribe, yet they are not singular in the practice; since every dynasty in Rajast'han has its history similarly chronicled. Colonel Tod remarks (in the letter which accompanied his donation) that the existence of such documents quite suffice to redeem these martial tribes from the sweeping charge of not possessing any works of an historical nature; for although they may be deficient in the philosophic dignity of the west, they can certainly challenge competition with the Saxon chronicles of our own early times. This roll has afforded Colonel Tod some aid in the work which he has now in the press-" The Annals and Antiquities of Rajast'han." From Lieutenant Colonel Briggs, M.R.A.S., a splendidly written Korān; and a copy of his Letters on India. From William Price, Esq., a copy of the Persian tale entitled Husn-oo-Du, or "Beauty and Heart;" with a translation by Mr. Price. From César Moreau, Esq., M.R. A.S., a copy of his Examen Statistique de la Royaume de France en 1827. From John Ranking, Esq., • We have much pleasure in adding, that Colonel Tod concluded the letter which accompanied his very valuable donation (after an appeal to the liberality of the members in favour of his immediate charge—the library) by announcing that he had bequeathed the whole of his MSS, and the oriental portion of his library to the Society.

his Researches into the Wars and Sports of the Mongols and Romans; and Researches into the Conquest of Peru and Mexico by the Moguls. From L. Hebert, Esq., editor of the Register of Arts, &c. the first volume of a new series of that work, containing several comparative views of Ceylonese and British machinery. From Lieutenant Colonel Pollock, of the Bengal artillery, through his brother D. Pollock, E-q., M., R. A.S., two Burmesc MSS, one a religious book, written in the round Pali character on plain palm leaves; the other written in white upon a black ground, appears to contain copies of despatches sent from Donabew by the Maha Bundoolah to various parts, referring to the arrival and advance of the English army: it was found in the Bundoolah's house at Donabew, after his death, by Col. Pollock.

For the Museum. - From Lieutenant Colonel Tod, 1. an inscription on stone, in very good preservation, in the character used by the Buddhists and Jains; 2. another inscription in a similar character, upon copper, from the ruins of Lodowa in the desert. This is the only specimen of this character upon copper that Colonel Tod ever discovered. Colonel Tod promises some remarks upon these and other inscriptions for the Society's Transaction . 3. A statue of a Hindu female divinity, from the ruins of Chandrábhágá in Haravati. The statue has apparently had six arms; but the Mahommedans having deprived it of all but the natural number, it is impossible to judge whom it is intended to represent. Chandrabhaga was one of the numerous cities founded by the Pramaras; and among the ruins of its eighty-four temples, many good specimens of the arts of an early period may still be found. This statue is stated not to be one of the most favourable specimens; but it was portable, and being mutilated, it could be removed without offending prejudice. 4. A small fragment representing two attendants on the greater divinities, brought by Colonel Tod from Gungabhéva, at the falls of the Chumbull. 5. A remarkably fine chank shell, from Sankha-dwara, the identical island in the gulf of Cutch where Hindu mythology places the scene of the recovery of the sacred volumes by Krishna, whose exploit, in the destruction of the serpent spoliator, gives him the character of the Pythic Apollo. 6. A quiver of arrows, such as are used throughout Northern India; this was made at Lahore, and is of rich blue velvet, embroidered with gold. 7. The shooting equipage of a Rajput chieftain, consisting of a pawder-flask, shot or ball case (both covered with green velvet), match, and prinning horn, which is made of the antelope's horn, with a carved ivory head. From Lieutenant Colonel Briggs, models of the following agricultural implements: 1, the nagar, or heavy plough, usually drawn by from five to ten yoke of oxen, valued at about fifty rupees each. This plough is used for the purpose of breaking up ground previously uncultivated; it penetrates about fifteen inches deep, and in its progress tears up by the roots a very thick strong grass, which would otherwise prove injurious to the crops; after a short interval, this plough is followed by, 2. the vacker, or scarifier, which removes the grass before-mentioned, and weeds; it is also used for a variety of other purposes. 3. The large pāmber, or drill plough, with three shares, used for sowing round grain. 4. The small pamber, or drill plough, with four shares, used for wheat, &c.: behind this plough is a feeder, by means of which a man sows oil-seed between the two middle farrows. 5. The kölpa, or drill hoe; used for keeping the furrows free from weeds, &c. : sometimes one man has the charge of two of these instruments; in which case a forked stick, cut from the edge, and placed behind each, serves him to direct their progress. In presenting these models, Colonel Briggs took occasion to explain to the meeting the manner of their employment, and generally, the system of agriculture in use among the cultivators of the Deccan; from which explanation the above particulars were collected. From Lieutenant Colonel Coombs, two spears used by the natives of the Malayan peninsula, and six Candyan copper coins. Lieutenant Colonel Pollock, a small metal figure of Buddha, in a temple.

The thanks of the Society were ordered to be returned to the respective Colonel Briggs then read to the meeting his translation of a curious autobiographical memoir of Nana Furnevees, the celebrated minister of the Mahratta state. At a very early age, Nana became the intimate friend of Madhoo Rao the Great, who succeeded his father in 1761, shortly after the battle of Paniput, which threatened the extinction of the Mahratta power in Hindustan. At this period he was but seventeen years of age, and Nana was nineteen; the latter had been brought up to the study of the Védas and Sastras, but he succeeded to the office of Furnevees (literally, record-keeper), which had been held in his family for three generations. This was an office which, by bringing the person who filled it constantly into contact with the prince, was very favourable to the development of those superior qualities which Nana possessed in an eminent degree; and he consequently was honoured with an intimacy and confidence by his prince which only terminated with the death of the latter, at the early age of twenty-eight.

Colonel Briggs briefly sketches the public career of this celebrated individual up to the period of his death in 1800; and then states how the original of this paper came into his possession. In the course of his inquiries for information regarding this extraordinary person, he was enabled to gain access to his private papers; and a person, who was confidential clerk to the family, brought to him the curious and highly interesting relic, of which Colonel B. now presented a translation. The manuscript (which was in Nana's own handwriting) commences from his birth, but is only brought down to the period when Madhoo Rao ascended the throne. The translator remarks, that it is certainly a remarkable circumstance that Nana Furnevees should have written his life; but at the same time adduces very strong arguments in proof of its authenticity.

The memoir opens with a beautiful disquisition upon the being and attributes of the Deity; and from thence passes to a consideration of the constitution of human nature. The narrative then commences, and states that while yet a child, Nana had a strong tendency to religion, and used to amuse himself with performing the sacrificial ceremonies before the household images. He was not contracted in marriage till his tenth year, but about his twelfth year he began to feel the influence of the passions, which grew upon him to such a degree, that at the early age of seventeen he resolved to retire from the world, and give himself up to devotional pursuits. In the progress of his pilgrimage he states himself to have bathed in the very pool where Krishna is said to have crushed the serpent Kalya; and to have visited several other scenes of the exploits of this deity. The details of the fatal battle of Paniput are next given, and the total desertion of their commander. Bhow Sahib, the Peishwa's brother, by the Mahratta nobles, is severely commented on. It is observed, that so complete was his abandonment, that no one knew how he fell, or what became of him. An account of the manner in which Nana himself escaped, and of his safe arrival at the court of the Peishwa, then follows. The paper concludes with a statement of the death of Nana Sahib, the Peishwa, and the accession of Madhoo Rao to the musnud, upon which occasion Nana returns to public life in the office before-mentioned.

Colonel Briggs accompanies his translation with some observations upon this remarkable narrative; noticing, first, the pure and elevated sentiments which Nana Furnevees appears to have entertained upon the subject of the Deity, as exemplified in the introduction to his memoir, and in the whole tenour of his conduct through the many scenes of danger and difficulty he had already encountered, up to the time when he wrote this manuscript, and the strong contrast which these lofty ideas form with the humility of his opinions respecting his own nature. The translator concludes with expressing his opinions nion that, judging from this small specimen of the talents of Nana Furnevees, an extended memoir of his private life would prove both an interesting and valuable work.

The thanks of the meeting were unanimously voted to Colonel Briggs for the communication of this very interesting paper.

The next general meeting of the Society will be on Saturday, May 3d, at 2 o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

EAST-INDIA TRADE.

(Ordered to be printed, 21st March 1828.)

A Return of the Number of Ships cleared out from the different Ports in the United Kingdom, for to inclusive; specifying their Tonnage, the Number of Scamen employed in navigating them, whether British or Indian, and distinguishing the Ships belonging to or chartered by the East-India Company from those of private Merchants.

|                                         | Total Nufrom t | mber of Shipshe Ports of theKingdom. | cleared outUnited | Ships belonging to or chartered bythe East-India Company. |        |       |  |  |
|-----------------------------------------|--------------------|----------------------------------------------|-----------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------|--------|-------|--|--|
|  | Ships.             | Tons.                                        | Men.*                 | Ships.                                                        | Tons.  | Men.  |  |  |
| In the Year 1814                        | 52                 | 39,141                                       | 4,342                 | 36                                                            | 34,819 | 3,521 |  |  |
| 1815                                    | 121                | 79,980                                       | 8,610                 | 26                                                            | 29,177 | 2,603 |  |  |
| 1816                                    | 166                | 99,936                                       | 9,412                 | 26                                                            | 26,063 | 2,891 |  |  |
| 1817                                    | 195                | 106,847                                      | 8,543                 | 22                                                            | 22,326 | 2,305 |  |  |
| 1818                                    | 186                | 101,692                                      | 8,210                 | 32                                                            | 29,245 | 3,048 |  |  |
| 1819                                    | 106                | 66,525                                       | 5,606                 | 35                                                            | 27,419 | 2,546 |  |  |
| 1820                                    | 109                | 69,265                                       | 5,731                 | 22                                                            | 23,473 | 2,425 |  |  |
| 1821                                    | 96                 | 68,155                                       | 5,811                 | 25                                                            | 29,468 | 2,859 |  |  |
| 1822                                    | 102                | 73,102                                       | 6,267                 | 25                                                            | 24,928 | 2,501 |  |  |
| 1823                                    | 111                | 68,468                                       | 5,591                 | 24                                                            | 26,484 | 2,699 |  |  |
| 1824                                    | 117                | 79,283                                       | 6,973                 | 25                                                            | 27,580 | 2,819 |  |  |
| 1825                                    | 139                | 81,103                                       | 7,095                 | 32                                                            | 33,205 | 3,188 |  |  |
| 1826                                    | 150                | 88,700                                       | 7,443                 | 26                                                            | 28,985 | 2,675 |  |  |

Note.—The above account includes the trade with China, as vessels, whose ultimate voyage is to that country, usually clear out for the East-Indies also.

TEA.

(Ordered to be printed, 2d April 1828.)

An Account of the Quantity of Tea imported into, exported from, and retained for Home Consumption in, Great Britain, in each of the Two Years 1826 and 1827.

|          | Year 1826.                            | Year 1827.                                      |
|----------|---------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------|
| Imported | 29,840,4014,086,83525,238,006 | . lbs.39,746,2374,142,94926,043,227 |

VARIETIES.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

A meeting of this Society was held Nov. 21, the president, W. Leycester, Esq., in the chair. Amongst the gentlemen elected members were Baboos Daya Chund Addy, Sibchunder Das, and Abhaya Charan Banerji.

The president laid before the meeting a report of the distribution of the kitchengarden seeds, recently received from Liverpool, Patna, and the Nilgherri Hills. The seeds from Liverpool cost nearly £100. The supply consisted of seventeen sorts of the cabbage species, including cauliflowers and brocoli, four of lettuce, three of radish, four of onions, one of celery, one of parsley, nine sorts of peas, nine sorts of strawberries, and one of artichoke. One-half the quantity was distributed gratuitously to native gardeners along with the Patna and Nilgherri parcels. Some parcels were sent to Penang and other places. A great portion of the rest was distributed to the members, with exception of the strawberry seeds, which were mostly reserved for the Society's experimental garden. The remaining quantity was sold in parcels, like those given to the members, for twenty rupees each, realizing a considerable portion of the outlay, and thus enabling the Society to effect a similar purchase next year, without any material diminution of their funds. It was accordingly resolved to indent upon Liverpool for a fresh supply of seeds for the season of 1828.

A plant of the Maranta Arundinacca, or that yielding the West-India arrowroot, reared in Calcutta, by the president, from a plant brought from the Cape of Good Hope, was presented by him, as well as a specimen of the arrow-root, prepared from its tubers, which has been pronounced by several medical men to be of the best quality.

Specimens of Himalayan wheat, with observations on them and other vegetable products of the hills, were presented by Mr. Royle.

An account of a new kind of plum, resembling a cherry, found in Asam, and observations on extending the growth of the apple and pear in Hindustan, were received from Mr. Scott.

A letter was read from Mr. Williams, of Sricole, in Jessore, on the influence of the moon's age, on the rise and fall of the sap of trees, and the consequent effects on the seasoning of timber.

A letter from Baboo Radhakant Deb was read on the use of manure, according to the English system, intended to introduce its employment amongst the natives .- Cal. Gov. Gaz.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

A meeting of the Society was held on the 1st Dec., Mr. Wilson, vice-president, in the chair.

A paper by Dr. G. M. Patterson, on the Pathology of the cerebellum, and a communication by Mr. Twining, on the use of the lactucarium, prepared in India at the General Hospital, were read, and made the subjects discussion. The efficacy of the narcotic juice of the lettuce, in the cases in which it was administered, has proved less decided than was inferred from its first trial; but it appears to have been sensibly felt in some instances, and the substance is considered deserving of further investigation .-Ib.

BOMBAY LITERARY SOCIETY.

The anniversary meeting of the Literary Society of Bombay was held at its rooms, on Monday the 26th November.

The usual business having been transacted, the secretary (Lieut. Col. V. Kennedy) addressed the meeting as follows:

" Mr. Vice-President and gentlemen : as you have all so lately participated in presenting to the Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone, on his resignation of this government, those tributes of regret and applause, to which his distinguished and pre-eminent merits so justly entitled him, it becomes unnecessary to intimate, that in consequence of his departure the situation of president of this Society has become vacant. Previously, however, to proceeding to the election of his successor, permit me to recall to your attention the important benefits which not only this Society, but oriental literature in general, has derived from that cultivation and promotion of literary pursuits, with which he delighted to solace the few hours that he could abstract from the multiplied avocations of official business: but I should have been most happy had some person, much better qualified than I am to speak on such a subject, undertaken to submit it to your notice; as I am too well aware that I can but inadequately convey even an imperfect notion of the extensive conversancy with literature for which Mr. Elphinstone was so eminently distinguished, and of that constant solicitude and liberality with which he encouraged every means that could tend to promote its general and beneficial diffusion.

" It must at the same time be admitted, that from a singularly diffident and retiring disposition, which is so often the accompaniment and ornament of real ability, neither our labours have been animated by those discourses, nor our Transactions enriched with those memoirs, which Mr. Elphinstone was so competent to compose; for, if not a profound classical scholar, he was sufficiently master of the Greek and Latin languages to enable him to appreciate and enjoy the matchless works of antiquity; and with the modern literature of his own country, France, and Italy, he was intimately acquainted. But his active life and public duties restricted his knowledge of the numerous languages of Asia to a conversancy with persian, and prevented him from prosecuting, even in that language, the study of oriental learning by applying to its original sources; yet his information on all subjects connected with it, and particularly with the civil and political history of Persia and India, was most extensive. That cause, perhaps, united to the correct and elegant taste which he had derived from nature, but which he had improved and sedu-lausly cultivated, by the perusal of the best ancient and modern authors, rendered him a rather too severe critic of He denied not, oriental composition. indeed, that its occasional beauties deserved every praise, but he was inclined to think that these could not compensate for its numerous imperfections. This opinion, however, applied merely to the critical merits of Eastern literature; for he evinced, by means of enlightened acts, his firm conviction that the government of this country could not be conducted efficiently and prosperously for many years without adapting it, as far as the real interests of the people would admit, to their longestablished and deeply-rooted habits and prejudices; and hence it was that, in order to acquire an accurate knowledge of their customs, usages, and laws, he encouraged with the utmost munificence the study of the native languages and lite-

"But from his estimation of the native character, which he must have viewed in its most unfavourable light, during his official intercourse with the late Peishwalt, whose conduct and that of his misters, during the last six years of his government, was so marked with duplicity and disregard of every principle of honour and rectitude, Mr. Elphinstone was persuaded that mental and moral improvement were indispensable for securing the real prosperity of this country, and for enabling the people to understand and appreciate that impartiality, integrity, and justice, which distinguish the British government. Education, therefore, appeared to his enlightened views the most safe and efficient means for improving the native mind, and rendering the people eventually qualified for a participation in the government of their own country: and Mr. Elphinstone, therefore, encouraged with the most liberal support the establishment and exertions of the Native Education Society, which promise to be attended with such beneficial results. Hence the future consequences, which may be produced by thus promoting the cultivation of Western and Eastern literature in this country, becomes a subject of most interesting speculation. though the advancement which the natives may attain is still problematical, it cannot be denied that they possess the greatest aptitude for instruction; and it will be obvious that the more intimately acquainted with them British gentlemen may become, the more capable will they be of ascertaining correctly the motives and principles of conduct which actuate the present Hindu, and of penetrating into the darkest recesses of that antique, rich, and copious mine of Sanscrit learning, which has been hitherto so little explored.

" It was to assist in the attainment of objects of such importance that Mr. Elphinstone was always most anxious to promote the interests of this Society, and that he unceasingly endeavoured to incite every person with whom he was acquainted to favour it with contributions. If, therefore, six years have elapsed without our having been able to publish another volume of our Transactions, this dearth of communications would not have occurred had it been in the power of the president to have prevented it; but the limited extent of this presidency, the lamented death or regretted departure to Europe of some of our most distinguished members, and the difficulty of literary pursuits in this country, present causes fully sufficient for explaining this suspension, which, I trust, is merely temporary, of the publication of volumes similar to those which have been already nonoured with the approbation of the public.

" It must appear surprising that, amidst the numerous objects so fully descrying of investigation which surround us, so few persons are inclined to devote themselves to some one of those various studies, for the cultivation of which this country seems to afford the greatest incitements; and still more so, that of such gentlemen as are engaged in these pursuits scarcely any one appears inclined to avail himself of our Transactions, for the purpose of communicating to the public the result of his researches. But there is one obstacle to literary exertion in this country, which does not seem to have been hitherto duly appreciated; I mean the indispensable necessity of acquiring the vernacular dialect of the province in which such studies are pursued. For the antiquarian, the historian, and even the botanist, the physician, or the mineralogist, will find it difficult, without such a knowledge, to conduct his inquiries; and this defect will render his conclusions hoth unsatisfactory and but little entitled to have reliance placed upon them. If also the object of research be Muhammudan literature, no considerable progress in it could be attained without a competent conversancy with the Persian and Arabic languages; nor could the pursuit of Hindu learning be prosecuted with any success without the acquisition of Sanscrit. The study, however, of languages is to many persons so extremely irksome as to deter them from attempting to approach by so rugged a path that portal, which would introduce them into so novel a scene, abounding in diversified objects of curiosity and instruction; but to facilitate this approach Mr. Elphinstone has encouraged and promoted, by the enlightened liberality of the government over which he presided, the compilation and publication of grammars and distionaries of the Maratha and Gurirati languages, which, to the disgrace of this presidency, had remained so long neglected, and also the publication of several works composed in them. These languages, it is true, have no instrinsic merit, for they are merely colloquial, and possess no valuable works, but they are the mother tongues of the people who are placed under this government; and in both the Maratha and Gurirati provinces a knowledge of Hindustani is by no means generally prevalent. In this part of India, therefore, it will be evident how impossible it must be for any person to pursue effectually any object of research without a knowledge of one, or perhaps both of these vernacular dialects, in order to put him in possession of a medium of communication between himself and those from whom he may require information.

" It is not, however, by his public measures or private exertions alone that Mr. Elphinstone has thus successfully contributed to the promotion of literature, for his invaluable account of the embassy to Cabul will ever remain a memorial, and I hope not the only memoreal, of his eminent literary qualifications; and from the public applause which it has so justly received, it must also afford a most inciting assurance, that neither an active life nor official business do necessarily prevent the prosecution of intellectual pursuits. Occupied, indeed, as Mr. Elphinstone always seemed to be, either m the discharge of his numerous and important public duties, or in maintaining the intercourse of private life with that urbanity and engaging friendliness for which he was so peculiarly distinguished, these words of Catullus to Crassus in Cicero's Treatise de Oratore, became strikingly applicable to the extent of acquirements displayed in Mr. Elphinstone's conversation:— 'Sed tamen, cum omnes gradus ætatis recordor tuæ, eumque vitam tuam ac studia considero: neque, quo tempore ista didiceris, video, nec magno-pere te istis studiis, hominibus, libris, intellego, deditum. Neque tamen possum statuere, utrum magis mirer te illa, quæ mihi persuades maxima esse adiumenta, potuisse in tuis tantis occupationibus, perdiscere, an si non potueris nosse isto modo dicere." It was, therefore, to that instructive intercourse, to that courtesy with wich Mr. Elphinstone listened to those with whom he conversed, to that unassuming and engaging manner with which he communicated the copious and diversified stores of his own knowledge, and to the bright example of his literary excellence, that is principally to be ascribed the more general diffusion of a literary taste throughout this presidency. For it was impossible to be admitted into the society of so highly talented" an individual without admiring his commanding abilities, and being sensible that literature most eminently contributed to adorn his richly cultivated mind; but what man admires he wishes to imitate, and though it is not likely that any person could entertain even the slightest expectation of emulating the numerous accomplishments of Mr. Elphiustone, he might still be permitted to hope, that by cultivating his own mind he might render himself more worthy of the notice with which Mr. Elphinstone honoured him.

" That such was actually the case I may confidently appeal to the gentlemen present to attest, and to them also are well known the subjects to which I have now ventured to advert, in a manner so very inadequate to their importance. To prolong these imperfect remarks must he unnecessary, for I am persuaded that every member will be of opinion that the Society ought to testify the high sense which it entertains of Mr. Elphinstone's literary excellence, of his constant solicitude to promote the diffusion of literature and knowledge, and of the grateful remembrance which the Society will ever preserve of his unceasing interest in the furtherance of the objects of its institution by some permanent memorial, which shall not only perpetuate his memory, but also incite the beholder to imitate, in the cultivation of his own mind, so illustrious an example. I beg leave in consequence to propose, that Mr. Elphinstone be requested to sit for his bust on his arrival in England, in order that it may be placed in the rooms of the Literary Society of Bombay."

This proposition was unanimously adopted.

It was next resolved, that Major General the Hon. Sir John Malcolm be elected president of the Society, in the place of the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone.

Lieutenant Colonel Kennedy having here begged leave to resign the situation of secretary to the Society and its two committees, it was resolved that the unanimous thanks of the Society be conveyed to Lieutenant Colonel Kennedy, for the very great benefits which the Society has derived, during the period that he has held the situation of secretary, from his assiduous zeal, extersive bibliographical knowledge, and literary abilities.

The deputation accordingly waited upon Major General the Honourable Sir John Malcolm the following morning, and communicated to him the request of the Society, when Sir John Malcolm was pleased to do the Society the honour of accepting the situation of president.—

Bomb. Cour., Dec. 1.

THE CHINESE KEYS OR RADICALS.

M. Klaproth has published the following remarks upon the keys or radical characters in the Chinese language, in the Nouveau Journal Asiatique, for March 1828:—

M. Abel Remusat, in his excellent Chinese Grammar (pp. 8, 9), has well explained the nature of the poo, or Chinesc keys: he there observes, that " the distinction of the poo was made at different periods by various anthors, and solely with the view of classing the characters." Many persons, however, deceived by the fancies or rather reveries of Fourmont regarding the 214 keys, still believe that the Chinese first began by forming these 214 principal characters, and that they then compounded all the others by a combination of these primitive radicals. This fantastic explanation of the keys is the only addition made by M. Deguignes to the Chinese and Latin Dictionary of F. Basil of Glemona, who was employed to publish it. M. Deguignes found in the Meditationes Sinica of Fourmont such phrases as these: yih, "key of unity, of priority, and perfection;" or at the second key, hwan, " key of increase, &c." A single glance at the meaning of the eight characters arranged in the dictionary under the latter key, will demonstrate the fallacy of this system; for the things they denote recall no such idea. They signify: ya, a fork; ko, a numeral particle; chung, the middle; fang, a full face; kwan, to tie the hair in two tufts upon the head; ch'huen, to string; ch'han, a gridiron.

Those who know Chinese have long ago rejected the erroneous assertions of Four-These assertions are, nevertheless, again brought forward in a work on Chinese philosophy recently published in Germany. The fact is, that the Chinese characters were not originally formed according to any general system : those who formed them followed no other law than necessity, which obliged them to invent a sign to express such or such an object or idea. It was not till long after the whole of the characters were formed that the idea ever occurred of subjecting them to a minute examination, in order to extract from a certain number of groups, one of which was found in each character, under which by these means all the ideographical signs which compose Chinese writing might be arranged: hence the oldest Chinese lexicons or vocabnlaries, such as the Urh-ya, and others besides, are not arranged according to the system of keys, but in the order of subjects. This order begins with heaven and ends with animals.

Heu-shin, the celebrated author of the dictionary Shwö-wän, which he finished in the year 121 of our era, was the first who conceived the happy idea of extracting from the aggregate Chinese characters, poo, or keys, under which they might be arranged. He fixed the number of them at 510, and disposed them in what appears an arbitrary order. Some editors of his work have arranged these 510 poo according to the consonants of the words they represent, and they have disposed them in the series of the Chinese consonants, which follow each other nearly in the same order as those of the Indian alphabet, beginning by k and ending by j. Koo-ye-wang, author of the Yuh-p'hëen, who finished this celebrated dictionary A.D. 513, adopted 512 keys, partly the same as those of the Shurt-wan. The successors of these two great lexicographers have considerably altered the order and the number of the keys, each following the system he had adopted for his own particular work. The dictionary hwang-yun, finished A. D. 1011, has 206 keys. Sze-ma-kwang has inserted 513 in his Luy-p'hien. The great dictionary P'hëen-hae has 444. dictionary P'hëen-hae has 444. The Hung-woo-ching-yun, compiled in the reign of the first emperor of the Ming dynasty, carries the number of keys to 500, &c. &c. Other lexicographers have greatly diminished the number of the keys: the author of the Lo-shoo-foo, for example, has distributed all the characters explained in that dictionary under 93 poo. This uncertainty regarding the number of keys continued till 1616, the period when the celebrated Mae-tan published his Tsze-hwny, who was the first to determine the 211 keys now in use. They were adopted by the author of the Ching-taze-t'hung, and finally by the emperor Kang-he, in his Kang-he-tsze-ten. Their system is, without dispute, the best and most convenient of all extant, and does not appear likely to be speedily changed; but these 214 signs ought by no means to be regarded as the primitive characters of Chinese writing.

HOSPITAL FOR ANIMALS IN INDIA.

At Broach is one of those remarkable institutions which have made a good deal of noise in Europe as instances of Hindoo benevolence to inferior animals: I mean hospitals for sick and infirm beasts, birds, and insects. I was not able to visit it, but Mr. Corsellis described it as a very dirty and neglected place, which, though it has considerable endowments in land, only serves to enrich the Brahmins who manage it. They have really animals of several different kinds there. not only those which are accounted sacred by the Hindoos, as monkeys, peacocks, &c., but horses, dogs, and cats; they have also, in little boxes, an assortment of lice and fleas. It is not true, however, that they feed those pensioners on the flesh of beggars hard for the purpose : the Brahmins say that insects, as well as the other immates of their infirmary, are fed with vegetables only, such as rice, &c. How the insects thrive I did not hear, but the old horses and dogs, may the peacocks and apes, are allowed to starve, and the only creatures said to be in any tolerable plight are some milch cows, which may be kept from other motives than charity. - Heber's Journal.

PHENOMI.NON.

A whale has recently been taken in Oyster Bay (Van Diemen's Land), exhibiting a most singular phenomenon. On cutting it up the blubber appeared of a blood red, and after boiling, the oil, which is of a very good quality, assumed the same colour. The fish exhibited no extraordinary appearance externally, but turned out seven tuns of oil, specimens of which have been sent to the faculty for analysis.—Colonial Times.

DIVERSITY OF TASTE RESPECTING FOOD.

We have many examples of the partiality of comparatively civilized races of men to a dict which to us appears loath-some and offensive, and which these nations from habit, or naturally depraved taste, would prefer to the choicest disless at an alderman's dinner in Guildhall. The Pariahs of Hindoostan (it is observed in a recent work), attracted by the stench of rotten carcases, fly in crowds to dispute the infectious carrion with the dogs, the ravens, and other birds of prey. They share the mass of corruption, and return to their dens to devour it without rice, seasoning, or any other accompaniment. Little do they care of what disease the animal may have died, for they make no scruple to poison secretly their neighbour's oxen and cows to provide a savage repast for their ravenous appetites. The Bushmen of Southern Africa generally eat the flesh raw, and when they cook it, they only warm it, and apply their teeth to it at the moment it is taken from the ashes. The inhabitants of the Kurulean Isles are very partial to bear's liver. Chinese are not particular in their choice of animal food: cats, dogs, rats, and almost every species of animals, serpents, &c. and which have either been killed or died a natural death. It was a practice in China at one time for tavernkeepers to put to death a fat guest, when opportunity served, and to make pies, &c. of the flesh for the entertainment of their other guests who were so fortunate as not to be so well fed. Bears' paws, birds'-nests, and sea-slug, are considered great delicacies. The Tibetians prefer great delicacies. raw to roasted mutton. The Cochin Chinese prefer rotten eggs to fresh; putrid eggs cost more than the latter by 30 per cent .- Chinese Chronicle of Malacca.

SHAMANISM IN SIEFRIA.

" April 9, 1827 .- This evening I learned that there were to be some Shaman rites performed at a tent about a mile from the house. After supper I went with my three young men to witness the ceremonies. They had not begun when we arrived. I was the more desirous to see this service, because, from what I had heard of it, I thought there was a remarkable resemblance in it to some of the ceremonies connected with the scape-goat of the Mosaic economy. They call it the letting loose of the goat. Upon this occasion the animal provided was rather a kid than a goat. There were two Shamans, men, present, or as they are termed, Boo, and two female Shumans, or Odagan. A young man was sitting by the wall of the tent dressing the goat, that is fastening little brass rings, corals, and other ornaments to its legs, neck, ears, &c. This occupied unwards of halt an hour; two or three lighted lamps were placed on a table at the west side of the tent, before the sheep-skin images. Before the table were placed the two Shaman sticks, called horses, being ornamented with the figure of a horse's head on the top, and hung round with a number of iron rings and flat shps of the same metal, which make a tinkling noise when the stick is moved. A sword was stuck in the ground beside them. The use of these articles will be seen immediately. The younger of the two Shamans began the service by playing for a few minutes upon a Jew's harp, the instrument the Shamans use to invoke the objects of their worship, and, as they say, to bring their own minds into a fit state to hold intercourse with them. The harp was then handed across the tent to one of the Odagans, who began to play in the same strain. In the mean time the younger Shaman rose, laid aside his girdle, and hung a circular plate of brass round his neck. He then turned towards the table were the lamps where burning, and taking a taper in his hand, and waving it with a slow continued motion over the table, began to mutter, in a low tone, a kind of prayer, or incantation. This was in the Mongolian language, but pronounced in so low a voice, and so indistinctly, that I could not understand This lasted fifteen or a single word. twenty minutes, and then seizing the two sticks, one in each hand, holding also the sword in his left hand, with its point to the ground, he turned towards the fire in the middle of the tent, muttering all the while his invocations. A wooden cup was then given him, and a man stood by with a vessel containing some milk. The milk was poured, in small portions, into the cup, and the Shaman threw the first part into the fire, then repeated portions out of the hole in the roof of the tent, towards the east, west, south, and north. The Shaman then began to utter words in a louder tone, and to use more violent gesticulations. His whole frame became agitated, and after reeling about the tent for some time, he sat down in his place. The old Shaman, who was quite blind and apparently very infirm, then rose, took the two sticks (omitting the sword) and began his prayers; at first his voice was low, and his motions gentle, but as he continued to strike the ground with his two rattling-sticks, he gradually became more active, began to make strange noises, hissing like a cat, and growling like an angry dog; his legs then began to tremble, his whole body shook violently, and at last he began to jump with an agility and force which I did not think so feeble a man was capable of. This exercise lasted till he was quite exhausted, and he sunk down upon the floor.

The other Shaman rose a second time, took his two sticks and sword. The people, who were crowded all round the tent, now drew back as far as possible, and the wooden posts, which partly support the roof of the tent, were removed to allow more space for going round the fire. The man appeared now wrought up to a higher eestacy; he walked, or rather staggered, round the fire, leaning on the two sticks, now and then jumping violently, and, to appearance. unconscious of the presence of any one In the midst of these feats, he threw of his boots, and began to rake out the burning cinders from the fire with his hands, and spread them by the side of the fire-place. He took up a piece of live charcoal, and held it for some time in his hand, but, as I could perceive, in a way that could not burn him. Next he began to dance upon the glowing cinders with his naked feet, but neither didthis seem very extraordinary, for the quickness of the motion soon scattered the ashes, so that he could not be burnt. The last part of the farce, for such I consider it to be, was his laying down the two sticks, and reeling about with the sword in his hand, setting the point of it first against his side, then against his breast. He now staggered towards the door, and placing the hilt of the sword against the wall, with the point of it to his breast, leaned and pushed against it, as if he had been forcing it into his body; at last it seemed to go in, and he writhed and twisted his body, as if he had been really pierced through, and was making efforts to draw the weapon out; to assist him in this he then went towards the young man, who had been all this while holding the goat, and the lad, taking hold of the handle of the sword, drew it with all his might; I observed, however, that the Shaman was holding it by the blade, and after various struggles and contortions. he let it slip through his fingers, and so it seemed to be extracted from his body with a jerk. All this was performed with his back towards the people present, and not one of them could see whether the sword entered his body or not, but I am persuaded the whole was mere trick; and Gendeng, my writer, did not scruple openly to say so before them all, and taking the sword, went through the whole ecremony of stabbing himself in the way of This produced nothing but a smile from the spectators, and during the whole performances the people continued talking, laughing, and smoking their pipes with the greatest indifference. The old Shaman again rose and went through his part much in the same way as before, but not so violently; sometimes he suddenly stopped, and, turning round his blind eyes as if he wished to see something, mentioned a number of names, and inquired if such and such a one was well and happy. The other Shaman replied in a low voice, "well." Then were pronounced the names of their dead friends, and the old man pretended to see and converse with the spirits who had the charge of them in the invisible state. All these ceremonies were only preparatory to the letting loose of the goat, and now they began to talk of getting a horse provided provided for the "fit man," by whom the goat was to be sent away into the wilderness. Two other men were to go along with him, and the place to which the animal was to be taken was several versts distant, where there were no tents. On some occasions, they told me, the Shaman strikes the goat with a sword. but they never kill it, and after it is let loose they never inquire after it, nor is it ever more seen, as no doubt it soon becomes the prey of the wolves. I wished to wait till the whole was concluded, but I understood the Shamans were to repeat their tricks till day-break, and not till then was the animal to be sent away. I therefore returned home with my companions, not a little struck with these singular ceremonies. I could not learn that these Shamans had any reference to the expiation of sin in this service, nor that their scape-goat was considered as bearing away their iniquities. Their view of it rather is, that it is an offering very acceptable to the Ongoon, or spirits they worship, renders them propitious, procures blessings upon their cattle, and all their undertakings; for all the Shaman services, as far as I can learn, have no higher design than the procuring of temporal good, or the averting of temporal evil; neither could these poor people give me any account of the origm or source, whence they derived this ceremony. They trace their religion to no greater distance than the island Olchon, in the Baikal-lake, where, they beheve, the objects of their worship have their most sacred and honoured residence."-Journal of Mr. Swan, Miss. at Selenginsk.

MAJOR LAING AND CAPT. CLAPPERTON.

M. Rousseau. French consul at Tripol, has transmitted to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, some particulars regarding the fate of Major Laing and Capt. Clapperton, communicated to him by the Pacha, from information received from his own officer, the Governor of Ghadames, and from other native sources. Major Laing was not killed in the Tualt territory, as formerly stated; he was wounded only, and escaped from the assassins by the aid of a marahout (or holy man), and reached Timbuctoo. Soon atter his arrival in the city, the Fellans, or Fellatahs, a powerful and warlike horde, at present domineering throughout the immense deserts of Central Africa, came to Timbuctoo and demanded him authoritatively, in order to put him to death, "and thereby prevent," they said, "Christian nations from taking advantage of the intelligence he would be able to give them respecting Soudan, and pcnetrating at some period into these distant countries, in order to subdue the inhabitants." These are the precise expressions of the Sheikh of Ghadames. These Fellans, it appears, made themselves masters of Timbuctoo, previous to which, the city was ruled by twentyfour chiefs conjointly, amongst whom was a female named Nana Beira. One of these chiefs received Major Laing into his house, on the recommendation of Sheikh El Moktar, the person with whom he had taken refuge (on the banks of the Nile of the Negroes) after escaping from the Hangars. As soon as the Fellans approached the city, the chief sent Major Laing away by night under the care of some of his confidential domestics, one of whom, however, betrayed him secretly to the Fellans, and subsequently gave him the first stab with a dagger. This information comes from a Moorish merchant, a native of Ghadames, long settled at Timbuctoo, who communicated it in December 1826 to his cousin, who resided at the former place. The letter of the latter, dated August 1827, was received at Tripoli, accompanied by the original letter of his relation, in Septem-The Timbuctoo merchant states that the details he gives were procured from several inhabitants of that city, and from merchants who formed part of the caravan in which Major Laing travelled thither. M. Rousscau states that he expects a detailed account of the principal events which occurred to Major Laing after his departure from Ghadames, especially the attack of the Hangars (a nomade tribe, which the Fellans have now subdued), the almost miraculous manner in which he escaped, his arrival and stav at Timbuctoo, the social condition and military force of the Fellans, his flight from the city, and death.

Capt. Clapperton, it appears, was murdered at Sakatoo, which he had visited in his former journey. In the narrative published by Col. Denham and Capt. Clapperton, great praise is bestowed on Sultan Bello, the chief of the Fellatahs, who resides at Sakatoo, and who received Capt. C. very hospitably on his first visit. Letters from Tunbuctoo, seen by M. Rousscau, describe this sultan as a literary man, who has published several works on politics, history and jurisprudence. Yet it is this very person to whom the murder of these two unfortunate travellers, it seems, is to be attributed, since it he did not actually command, he permitted it, owing, it is supposed, to their being represented to him as spies sent into Soudan in order to collect information that would facilitate its conquest. It was a relation of this sultan, named Ahmed Labboo, who took Timbuctoo, where he put an end to the oligarchy which ruled that city, and, singularly enough, placed it under the sole government government of the very chief who entertained Major Laing, and contrived his escape: a circumstance naturally prompting a suspicion that he was secretly accessary to his assassination. His name is Othman Voold Quaid Abuhekr. Ahmed Labboo has marched to the west, in order to invade Bambara.*

ANALOGY BETWEEN FOSSIL AND LIVING ANIMALS.

A portion of the palate of a carnivorous animal has recently been discovered at Montmatre, which bears no resemblance to any living animal except the Didelphis Cynocephala of Van Diemen's Land; and M. Cuvier states that the resemblance between the two is so strong, that they scarcely seem to belong to different species.

THE ATTARAN RIVER.

The following account of an excursion up the Attaran River will, we doubt not, be read with much interest, from its connexion with one of the principal resources of the new acquisitions in that quarter, the teak forests, to which it offers access, and for the conveyance of which valuable timber to the British station it affords such facilities.

The party left Moal Mein, and doubled the point of the cantonments that projects to the north, where three important streams meet the San-luen from the north, the Geyn from the north-east, and the Attaran from the south-east. Above the point, the cantonments and town of Moal Mein expand over a considerable acelivity to the foot of a small hill: the river face extending about two miles on the west and north, along the main or Sanluen river, towards the mouth of the Attaran. The course of this river is from south-east to north-west: at the outlet it is deep and wide, the water is salt for some distance, and its banks are consequently overrun with trees, and jungle, usual in such situations. The plants near the water's edge are of stunted growth, but they increase as they recede, rising to the height of large trees, and produce a pleasing and picturesque effect. It is singular that soonduree, although abundant about Amherst and on Pulogynn, does not occur on this river. In the situations where found it is a much larger tree than in any part of Bengal, so much so as to suggest a doubt of their being identically the same, if they did not agree in every other respect. The tree is called honnejoo by the Burmese, and the timber is extensively used for posts in house-building.

At a distance, varying from two to six

* We are assured, from good authority, that the Pacha of Tripoli has denied to the British consul that he gave this information.—Ed. miles from the left bank, is a low range of hills that run nearly parallel to the river for twenty-six miles towards the boundary. Two villages were passed near the mouth of the river, one on the left bank, the former was extensive and populous. Extending from the banks on either hand are spacious plains well adapted for rice cultivation, and partially inundated during the rains.

Pabung hill is remarkable on account of its being perforated by a nullah, which forms a channel through its base. The hill is of an oblong form, its greatest length extending along the river, forming an almost perpendicular bank. Towards its southern extremity it declines to a small eminence surmounted by a pagoda, and having a kiyum, or convent. at the base. It is near this spot that the excavation occurs, forming a vaulted canal, which traverses the solid rock, and is about forty feet long and twenty feet wide; the roof is about twelve feet above the surface of the water, and is studded with short thick stalactites, tinged with blue and yellow. In the interstices the roof appears to be curiously scooped out into small angular faces, The hills generally along the Attaran consist of primitive lime-stone; their height rarely exceeds 400 feet, and they are covered on the sides and summit with a scanty vegetation. About eight miles above the Pabung hill is another hill, at a mile from the foot of which issues a hot spring; the water of it spreads into a small lake, the temperature of which was found to be 132°, the thermometer in the shade being 98°. Access to the spring itself was prevented by the lake which it had formed around it.

Beyond this spot the course of the river becomes more tortuous, the bank are loftier, and the character of the vegetation changes, indicating its eventuion from the influence of saline matters. The plants along the stream were cotton trees, palmiras, willows, bamboos, &c., and beyond the lakes were open and extensive plains. The site of the village of Attaran was passed but no traces of the place itself remain.

A few miles above a deserted village, called Assamee, the river becomes too shallow for boats of any burthen, and it was necessary therefore to proceed in light canoes. The Attaran runs here nearly north and south, in a very winding course, the water is clear and the stream rapid especially where interrupted by rocks or sand-banks. The bed is pebbly. The rocks are of lime-stone, sand-stone, and quartz, projecting from the banks. The course of the stream is much obstructed by shallows over which it was necessary to drag the canoes, and further by large trees which had fallen from the banks and were lying across the bed of the river. In the rains of course none of these obstacles occur, and the largest boats may be conveyed down, and boats of any size can pass along the branches of the river. The face of the country continued much the same: extensive plams stretched inland from the banks. dense volumes of smoke and crackling flame from which bore evidence to the activity with which the population were clearing the ground for cultivation, aided by the powerful effects of a scorching sun. The tracks of elephants were exceedingly frequent and in many places they had cleared away the jungle on the bank, where they were in the habit of descending to drink, as completely as if it had been the work of man. It was also not uncommon to observe two such ghats opposite to each other where these animals were accustomed to cross. The deep and fine sand along the edge of the water gave frequent cover to the eggs of the tortoise, deposited at the depth of one or two feet. The Burmese boatmen detect them by pushing a thin stick to that depth in the sand as they proceed, at every two or three paces, and when they feel or observe they have pierced an egg they turn up the sand with their hands and discover the nest. Jungle fowls, peacocks, rhinoceros-birds, snakebirds, divers, and kingfishers were very numerous. The traces of a tiger were only noticed at one spot in the sand. A mungoose, differing in some respects from that of Hindoostan, was observable, as was an innoxious snake, six feet long, which appeared to be the same as the dharaes of Bengal, and of which the flesh is eaten by the Burmans.

A forest of teak occurred at a short distance from the right bank, where traces existed of the timber having been felled and conveyed to the stream at no remote period. Some of the trees were well grown, straight, and from thirty-five to torty-five feet in height, and being eleven to thirteen feet in girth, the measurements being regulated on the same principle as noticed in the account of the excursion up the San-luen, several other valuable trees were growing in the same forest, and bamboos of the large kind.

On the left bank, at the distance of forty yards from the river, occurred another forest of teak, many of the trees were of a superior description. The forest extends about a mile along the river, and is said to run about a mile and a half inland. On the river side a second forest, or a continuation of the same succeeds, and teak-trees are observable for two miles up the river on either hand, sometimes quite close to the banks, and disappearing at intervals, the average girth of wenty-seven measurements was ten fect.

The general height of the stems thirty feet; but one noble specimen, which had fallen down, was fifty-six feet in length.

The river continued very winding, running north and south, and a range of hills was visible in front. Patches of teak were frequently observable, and noble clumps of the largest bamboos were common, as were the jarool tree and rattans. A group of five elephants, drinking at one of the ghats, was disturbed and retreated into the jungle. Within a few hundred yards from the halting-place, on the right bank, were numerons teaktrees; many, thirty to forty feet high. and ten to twelve feet in the girth. The bamboos found here are of the very best description; they belong to the thorny kind, were from sixty to seventy feet long, straight, of the average circumference of fifteen inches near the base, and ten inches at the height of fity-four feet; the thickness of the sides was an inch.

The shallowness of the water not permitting the further advance of the canoes, the excursion was prosecuted by land, notwithstanding the extreme heat, the thermometer being 95° in the shade. The path lay through close jungle, in the tracks of elephants chiefly, and led at first south and afterwards south-east. Several detached teak-trees were passed, and at noon a cluster of about 100 was encountered. Beyond this the same kind of tree predominated to the bank of the Meeteekeet nullah, a stream about thirty yards broad, running north and south, of beautifully clear water in a pebbly bottom. A great variety of valuable trees contributed to the formation of this forest.

The journey proceeded over irregular ground, occasionally swampy, a rivulet, running south south-east, was forded. At a short distance from the east bank of this stream commenced the great teak forest of the Attaran. At first the ground is low, but it leads to a narrow valley, between two parallel ranges of small hills entirely covered with teak-trees. After proceeding three miles through the forest, the Kyoomben Kyoun, or Teaktree rivulet was met with, running northwest, about thirty-six feet broad with high banks: the water was perfectly transparent and in the middle about two feet deep. The soil in the vicinity was mostly of sand and a yellowish clay and remarkably dry; the low ground was covered with verdure which offered a pleasing contrast to the barren aspect of the soft of the forest; where the verdure prevailed the teak was interrupted, the tree affecting high and dry situations.

Two days were devoted to the examination of the forest, which is far the largest that has yet been discovered, containing many thousand trees of the largest dimensions, and furnishing timber in ablundance.

abundance for military and naval purposes. It extends for five or six miles to the rivulet above noticed, the course of which it follows for a considerable distance until it is lost in a range of hills, which are visible to the south. It is about twenty-two miles from the Siamese frontier, the proximity of which has deterred the Burmese from cutting the timber. Its distance from Moal Mein is about 100 miles, but the timbers might be easily floated, in the rains, down the Kyoomben Kyoun rivulet into the Attaran, and along that river to the station. The same kind of hamboo, formerly noticed, is also abundanthere, and might be floated down with facility and advantage.

A number of the trees were measured and were mostly about thirty feet high to the branches, and ten to twelve feet in the girth. Trees of fifty feet high were not uncommon, and some of sixty were measured. In one instance the girth was twenty-four feet, but the stem soon divided into three vast limbs: the average girth was about eleven feet. Some other trees attain an immense size, and one wood-oil tree had a stem sixty feet to the first branch, and perfectly straight, the girth at six feet above the ground was twenty-one feet.

The population along the Attaran is much more scanty than along the Sanien. The villages are rare, a canoe was rarely seen, and not a single cotton or indigo plant was observable. The resort of the Tulien Ingitives to the banks of the stream will, however, it is to be expected, soon convert its desolate aspect into the lively seene of human exertion.—Call Gov. Gaz.

LAWS OF THE PADRIES OF SUMATRA.

It was customary for the Padries to declare war against any country which they thought might be overcome either by stratagem or force. When subdued the villages were delivered up to plunder and then burnt. If the war was protracted prisoners were sometimes sold and sometimes put to death. The Padries, without scruple, seized at pleasure on the females, married or single, and conveyed them to their respective countries, or put them to death, if opposed: but it is hoped that these acts have been committed by the hordes, whom force of arms only had compelled and united to the fortunes of the Padries to reimburse themselves at the expense of their neighbours. After all opposition had ceased a fine of one catty of gold, or 500 dollars, was universally levied on the conquered, as the price of peace and conversion. The following orders were general, and enforced with the greatest rigour, and transgression sometimes punished with death, A man who should dare to shave his beard was fined two dollars and a half. The filing of teeth was punished by the fine of a buffaloc. If the knees were bare the offender was fined two dollars. If the faces of the females were uncovered they paid a fine of three-quarters of a dollar. If women quarrelled five soccoss cach were levied; and the beating of a child was a penalty of half a dollar. The seller of tobacco paid a fine of five dollars, the eater of it was put to death, and the smoker fined five soocoos. Long nails on the fingers were reduced by cutting the flesh and the nails together. Neglect of matin prayers five soocoos penalty, and repeated neglect punished with The worst characters were apdeath. pointed by the conquerors to see these regulations enforced, and the love of money in these wretches produced numerous false accusations, so that the people were oppressed to the utmost and sought every opportunity of escape. Submission gave no security, for there was always found sufficient evil in the conquered to incur a finc.

NEW PUBLICATIONS. .

ENGLAND.

The Muhammedan System of Theology; or a Compendious Survey of the History and Doctrines of Islamism, contrasted with Christianty; together with remarks on the Prophecies relative to its Dissolution. By the Rev. W. II. Neale, A.M. 800, 108.

Oriental Fragments. By Maria Hack. 3s. 6d.

The East-India Gazetteer, contaming particular Descriptions of the Empires, Kingdoms, Principalities, &c. of Hindostan and the adjacent Countries. By Walter Hamilton. A new and improved Edition. 2 vols. 8vo.

Proceedings on the Trial in the Court of King's Bench, the 6th March 1828, on an Indictment, the King r. Sutton and Others, by a Special Jury, before the Right Hon. Lord Tenterden, for a Conspiracy to Negoclate the Sale of an East-India Cadetcy. 28.

Transactions of the Madras Literary Society. Part I. 4to. £1.5s.

Part I. of India; or Facts submitted to illustrate the Character and Condition of the Native Inhabitants; the Causes which have, for ages, obstructed its Improvement, &c. By R. Rickards, Esq. 8vo. 4s, 6d.

In the Press.

A Statement relative to Scrampore, supplementary to the "Brief Memoir." With an Introduction by the Rev. John Foster.

M. de la Voye, of the East-India Military Seminary, has in the press, Instructions on French Pronunciation and the Genders, in the form of a French Vocabulary and Reader.

BENGAL.

Documents illustrative of the Burman War, cot siting of Public Despatches and other Official and Demi-Official Communications, preceded by a listorical Sketch of the Events of the War, with a Map. Compiled and edited by H. H. Wilson, Esq. 4to. 24 Rs.

Transactions of the Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta. Vol. III. 8vo. 10 Rs.

The Bengal Racing Calendar, for 1906-1818. 6

ASIATIC INTELLIGENCE.

Calcutta.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

VETERINARY SURGEONS.

Fort William, Sept. 28, 1827.—With reference to G. O. of 9th Feb. 1827, the Vice-President in Council is pleased to lay down the following scale of pay and allowances for veterinary surgeons on this establishment, in accordance with the instructions of the Hon. Court of Directors, communicated in their general letter, dated 6th Sept. 1826.

| St.R. | A. P.      |
|-------|------------|
| 182   | 10 0       |
|       |            |
|       |            |
| 121   | 12 0       |
| 97    | 6 5        |
|       | 146121 |

| •                                                                  |     |    |        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|----|--------|
| Allowance for any Mont                                             | h.  |    | _      |
| Full Batta                                                         | 12l | 12 | 0      |
| Full Tentage                                                       | 50  |    | 0      |
| Gratuity                                                           | 24  | 0  | 0      |
| Horse Allowance, St. Rs. 60 0 0                                    | ,   |    |        |
| Deduct 1s. a day included in the pay                               |     |    |        |
| pay                                                                | 47  | 13 | 3      |
| Palankeen Allowance                                                | 30  | 7  | 0      |
| Total, exclusive of the pay ap-propriate to the class of each, | 274 | o  | _3 |

The horse and palankeen allowances will be drawn under the same rules that govern the claims of assistant surgeons of cavalry corps.

Sonat Rupees ......

Veterinary surgeons will be entitled to the indulgence of boat allowance on proceeding to join a regiment on their first arrival in India, as prescribed in paragraph 5 of G. O. 19th Sept. 1818.

The rates of pay and allowances now authorized are applicable to veterinary surgeons of H. M.,'s service on this establishment. Service out of India will give them a claim to the higher rates of pay, but they will only be permitted to draw, in the aggregate, the same amount of pay and regimental allowances as is granted to the veterinary surgeons of the Company's army of the same length of service in India. Any difference arising out of the application of this rule will be deducted from the batta of the individual. This order to have effect from the 1st proximo.

REGIMENTAL PAY AND ALLOWANCES.

Fort William, Sept. 28, 1827.—The inconveniencies attending some of the existing regulations regarding the mode of drawing regimental pay and allowances having been brought to the notice of Government, the Right Hon. the Vice-President in Council, for the purpose of simplifying the system of accounts, is pleased to direct, that from the 31st of December next, pay proper for all classes of Europeans shall, in like manner with regimental allowances, be drawn in arrears; and in regard to European officers, the whole according to the rates laid down in the annexed table, which in the total correspond exactly with those now existing, the calculations having, for greater accuracy, been made for a period of four years, in order to embrace a leap year.

To remedy other inconveniencies complained of, and to secure uniformity of arrangement in muster rolls, pay abstracts, and other documents of a similar nature, and thereby to lessen the number of retrenchments to which officers are now exposed, his Lordship in Council is pleased to announce to the army, that a work, containing forms of sundry documents connected with the pay and audit departments, tables of pay calculated for each day, in months of 28, 29, 30, and 31 days, and some general rules for the guidance of officers, is now under preparation, and that copies of it will be distributed to every regiment in the service. Blank forms of muster rolls and pay abstracts will also be supplied periodically to regiments from the lithographic press, at rates to be hereafter ascertained, and under rules and regulations which will be laid down in the work above alluded to.

In order to prevent a recurrence of such frauds as have recently been reported to have been committed on the Presidency Pay Office, by a pay serjeant, and to enable paymasters to check the pay-bills of troops, companies, and establishments, in a more efficient manner than can now be done by the numerical abstracts of the muster rolls, which are at present annexed to pay bills, his Lordship in Council directs, that on and after the 1st of January next, copies of muster rolls shall be furnished to paymasters, but the certificates, numerical abstract, and statement of pay in the originals, are to be omitted in the transcripts, and the following declaration substituted in their stead, viz.

I do declare upon honour, that the above is a faithful copy of the muster roll of the troop, company, or establishment, as the case may be, of the regiment, taken at for the month of the original of which was delivered to the mustering officer.

Commanding Troop, or Company, &c. Exd. C. D., Adj. E. F. Commanding Regiment, &c.

These copies are to be forwarded immediately after musters, direct to the paymaster, by the officer commanding the regiment, &c., or, in the event of one company or more being detached, by the officer who, as the senior, countersigns them.

WM. CASEMENT, Lieut. Col. Sec. to Gov. Mil. Dep.

Table of Regimental Pay and Allowances in Sonat Rupees: the same for any Month.

|                                     | In Garrison or Cantonment.* |        |           |                                         |                     | In the Fleld. |      |        |           |         |                     |        |
|-------------------------------------|-----------------------------|--------|-----------|-----------------------------------------|---------------------|---------------|------|--------|-----------|---------|---------------------|--------|
|                                     | Pay.                        | Batta. | Gratuity. | Tentage.                                | HorseAllowance. | Total.        | Pay. | Batta. | Gratuify. | Tentage | HorseAllowance. | Total. |
| Horse Artillery. Same as cavalry    | 0                           | 0      | 0         | o                                       | 0                   | 0             | 0    | 0      | 0         | 0       | 0                   | 0      |
| Foot Artilleru.                     |                             | +      |           |                                         | 1                   |               |      |        |           |         | ‡                   |        |
| Colonel or Lieut, Col. Commandant   | 304                         | 761    | 0         | 100                                     | 0                   | 1165          |      |        |           | 200     |                     | 1265   |
| Lieut. Colonel                      | 243                         | 304    | 0         | , 75                                    | 0                   |               | 243  |        |           | 150     |                     | 1002   |
| Major                               |                             | 228    |           |                                         | 0                   | 471           | 183  | 457    | 0         | 120     | 0                   |        |
| Captain                             |                             | 91     |           |                                         | 0                   |               | 140  |        |           |         |                     | 434    |
| Lieutenant                          | 70                          |        | 24        |                                         |                     |               | 70   |        |           |         |                     |        |
| 2d-Lieutenant                       | 60                          |        | 12        |                                         |                     | 143           | 60   | 91     | 12        | 50      |                     |        |
| Surgeon                             | 123                         |        | 36        |                                         |                     |               | 122  | 122    |           |         |                     |        |
| Assistant Surgeon                   | 61                          | 61     | 24§   |                                         | 0                   | 171           | 01   | 122    | 24        | 50      | 0                   | 257    |
| Engineers. Same as foot artillery   | C                           | 9      | 0         |                                         | 0                   | 0             | 0    | 0      | 0         | 0       | 0                   | 0      |
| European Infantry.                  | 100                         | 761    | ١,        | ا                                       | ٦                   | 1165          | 204  | 761    | 1         | 200     | 1 8                 | 1265   |
| Regimental Col. or Lieut, Col. Com. |                             | 304    |           |                                         | 5 0                 |               | 243  |        |           |         |                     | 1002   |
| Lieut. Colonel                      |                             | 228    |           |                                         | 0                   |               | 183  |        |           |         |                     | 759    |
| MajorCaptain or Surgeon         |                             | 91     |           |                                         |                     |               | 122  |        |           |         |                     | 415    |
| Lieutenant or Assistant Surgeon     |                             |        | 24        |                                         |                     | 171           |      | 122    |           |         |                     | 257    |
| Ensign                              | 49                          |        | 112       |                                         |                     | 132           |      | 91     |           |         |                     | 209    |
| Elisign                             | 1 "                         | 7 ~    | 1         | 1                                       | 1                   |               | 1 -  | 1      | 1         |         | '                   |        |
| Native Cavalry.                     |                             |        | _         |                                         |                     |               |      | Ι.     | ١.        |         |                     | ١      |
| Colonel or Licut. Col. Commandan    | t                           |        | •••       |                                         | • • • • •           | *          |      |        |           |         |                     | 1478   |
| Lieutenant Colonel                  | ••••                        |        |           | ••••                                    | • • • • •           |               |      | 609    |           |         |                     | 1157   |
| Major                               | • • • • •                   | ••••   | •••       | ••••                                    | • • • • •           | • • • • • •   |      |        |           |         |                     | 929    |
| Captain or Surgeon                  |                             |        |           |                                         |                     |               |      |        |           | 563     |                     |        |
| Lieutenant or Assistant Surgeon     | •••••                       | •••••  | ••••      | ••••                                    | •••••               | • • • • • •   | 1    | 1      | 24        | 1 30    |                     |        |
|                                     |                             |        |           |                                         |                     |               |      | 122    | 04        |         | 1                   | 341    |
| Veterinary Surgeon                  | •••••                       | •••••  | ••••      | ••••                                    | ••••                | •••••         |      |        |           |         |                     |        |
| Cornet                              |                             |        |           |                                         |                     |               |      |        |           |         |                     |        |
| Native Infantry.                    |                             |        |           |                                         |                     |               | 1904 | 761    | 10        | 900     |                     | 1265   |
| Colonel or Lieut. Col. Commandant   |                             |        |           |                                         |                     | 609           |      | 150    |           | 100     |                     |        |
| Lieutenant Colonel                  |                             |        |           |                                         |                     | 457           |      |        |           | 759     |                     |        |
| Major                               |                             |        |           |                                         |                     |               | 18:  |        |           |         | 41/                 |        |
| Lieutenant or Assistant Surgeon     | ••••                        |        |       | - • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • |                     | •••••         |      | 122    |           |         |                     | 25     |
| Ensign                              |                             |        |           |                                         |                     | •••••         |      | 91     |           |         |                     | 200    |
| 131151811                           |                             |        |           |                                         |                     | •             |      | 1      |           | 1       | 1                   | 1      |

• Commissioned officers of artillery or European regiments in the garrison of Fort William draw half batta and half tentage, and in that of Alhahabad, half batta and full tentage. In cantonments at and above Alhahabad, full batta and half lentage, and below that station full batta and half tentage, with exception of Dum Dum, where full tentage is specially allowed to the artillery.

† Regimental colonels and lieutenant-colonels commandant are allowed full batta at any station.

† Infantry officers, when entitled by the regulations to horse allowance, will draw for it at the rate of Triantry of the state of the charge of the control of the charge of the Above 20 do. 15s. do. or 102 100 do. do. do.

¶ A shilling per day, or Rs. 12 2as. 9ps. per month deducted on account of its being included in the pay summing the state of Rs. 30. 6 as. per month.

N.B. In drawing arrears for broken periods of any month, care must be taken to calculate them with reference to the actual number of days in the month, and agreeable to the rates here laid down. Officers will only drawing pay proper in their bills for December 1827, in order to its being brought into arrears, the same as the other allowances.

BATTALIONS OF GOLUNDAUZE.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 15, 1827.—With reference to Government G. O. of 28th ult, directing the Golundauze on this establishment to be formed into two battelions of eight companies each, the Commander-in-chief is pleased to direct, that the first eight companies of the present 6th or Native Battalion of Artillery will retain their present numbers, and continue to compose the 6th battalion. The other eight companies will form the 7th battalion of artillery, as follows:

9th comp. 6th bat. to be 1st comp. 7th bat.

| 10th  |     | do. | 2d   | do. |  |
|-------|-----|-----|------|-----|--|
| 1111  |     | do. | 3d   | do. |  |
| 19th  |     | do. | 4th  | do. |  |
| 10th  |     | do. | 5th  | do. |  |
| 1 445 | ••• | do  | 6th  | do. |  |
| 14111 | ••• | do  | 7th  | do  |  |
| 1500  | ••• | do. | 8th  | do. |  |
| 16tn  | ••• | uo. | 0111 | uo. |  |

Fort William, Nov. 16, 1827.—With reference to G. O. of 28th Sept. last, sanctioning the formation of the corps of Golundauze into two battalions of eight companies each, the following staff is allowed to each of the battalions.

1 Adjutant, and 1 interpreter and quarter master, non-effective.

I Medical officer, 1 serjeant-major, 1 quarter-master-serjeant, 1 drill serjeant, 1 havildar major, 1 quarter-master havildar, 1 drill naick, 1 drummajor, and 1 fife-major, effective.

The officer holding the appointment of interpreter to the artillery regiment at Dum Dum, is to be interpreter and quarter-master to the battalion of Golundauze at that station, without effecting the duties now performed by him.

ROBBERY AND MURDER OF SIPAHEES.

Head-Quarter, Oct. 29, 1827. — The Commander-in-chief has reason to believe that the Sipahees, who are going on leave or returning, are frequently robbed and murdered by Thags, through a neglect of the precautions which single travellers ought to take; his Exc. desires that the attention of the men may be called to the General Orders of the 28th April 1820, on this subject, and that all Sipahees going on leave may be warned especially against travelling by night and carrying money about their persons.

SUPERINTENDING SURGEONS.

Head-Quarters, Oct. SO, 1827.—With a view to divide, in a more convenient maner, the duty which is performed by the superintending surgeons at Barrackpore and Berhampore, the Commander-inchief is pleased to direct that the following military stations shall, in future, be included in their several circles:

The Barrackpore circle will contain that station, Dum-Dum, Chinsurah, Midnapore, Cuttack, Pooree, with the stations in Arracan, Chittagong, and Amherst Town.

The Berhampore circle will contain that station, Dacca, Sylhet, Jumalpore, the posts in Assam, and Titalya.

ANNUAL PRACTICE OF THE ARTILLERY.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 31, 1827. — The annual practice of the artillery will commence, at the several stations of the army, on the 1st December next, excepting at Nusseerabad and Kurnaul, where it is to commence on the 1st January, and the following movements are to take place, that the moving parties may reach their destination by the above dates.

The company of artillery at Dinapore will unite with the company at Benares, for the purpose of practice at the latter station, and the general officer commanding at Dinapoor will determine what details are to be left behind on the march of the company.

In all practicable cases detached details and guns at outposts are to join the headquarters of their respective divisions during the practice seasons.

On the conclusion of the practice, the company and details will return to their respective stations, and any detachments which have been on command from the head-quarters of their the Golundauze battalions for a period exceeding two years, will then be relieved as far as possible from the head-quarters of battalions.

PROVISIONS TO EUROPEAN SOLDIERY.

Fort William, Nov. 23, 1827 .- It appearing from the proceedings of a special committee of experienced officers of H.M.'s and the H.C.'s service, convened at Fort William, for the purpose of instituting arrangements for bettering the condition and promoting the comforts of the European soldiery, that the rations distributed at full batta stations so far exceed what is requisite as to prove in some respects injurious to the men, whilst at the half-batta stations the daily allowance of provisions is barely adequate for their support, the Governor-general in Council, at the recommendation of the committee, has been pleased to fix upon a medium of issue applicable to the circumstances of European troops in quarters at all the stations under the Bengal presidency.

2. From the 1st of January next, therefore, at Allahabad and all stations below, and from the same or any other date which his Exc. the Commander-in-chief may assign at all stations above that garrison, the following scale of daily issue is to constitute the rations of the European troops under the presidency of Fort William, viz. for each man:

1 lb. of meat, bone included, 1 lb. of bread, 3 lb. of fire-wood, 1 cittack of salt, and, until further orders, one dram and a balf of liquor.

3. An additional quarter of a pound of meat will be allowed for each man on service, or when marching, and also in a stationary camp, should such increase in that situation be deemed necessary by the officer commanding the troops on the spot. This addition, it is to be understood, is granted on the consideration that greater bodily exertion will require more nourish. ment, and one pound and a quarter it is calculated will give, allowing for bone, &c., about one pound of solid meat.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Judicial Department.

Nov. 8. Mr. Robert Walker, judge of city of Benares.

Mr. R. N. C. Hamilton, magistrate of ditto.

Mr. W. T. Robertson, judge and magistrate of Dec. 13. Mr. George Gough, register of zillah court at Tipperah. Futtalmore.

Mr. W. S. Alexander, assistant to magistrate and to collector of Hoogly.

20. Mr. R. H. Rattray, a puisne judge of courts of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adaw-

lut. Mr. H. Turnbull, first judge of courts of appeal and circuit for division of Calcutta.

Mr. R. Walpole, second judge of ditto ditto.

Territorial D partment.

Nov. 15. Mr. C. J. Davidson, superintendant of Eastern or Narraingunge division of sait chokies. M1. J. Drew, collector of land revenue and customs at Dacca.

Mr. Thos. Richardson, collector of Tip-

29. Mr. G. M. Batten, assistant to commissioner at Dehlee.

Political Department.

Nov. 2. Mr. R. N. C. Hamilton, assistant to agent to Governor-general at Benares.

9. Mr. Chas. Fraser, principal assistant at Sau-gor to agent to Governor-general in Saugor and Nerbudda territories.

Mr. Rich. Macan, principal assistant to agent to Governor-general in Saugor and Nerbudda terri-

16. Mr. C. E. Trevelyn, extra assistant to resident at Delhi.

23. Mr. E. C. Ravenshaw, second assistant to resident at Hyderabad.

30. Mr. G. T. Lushington, first assistant to secretary to government in Secret and Political departments

Dec. 7. Mr. T. H. Maddock, agent to Governor-general in Saugor and Nerbudda Territories. 14. Mr. C. R. Cartwright, first assistant to resident at Indore.

Mr. E. C. Ravenshaw, first assistant to resident at Hyderabad.

Mr. J. R. Colvin, second ditto ditto.

Capt. T. Dickenson, assistant to commissioners in Arracan.

General Department.

Dec. 7. Mr. Geo. Swinton, chief secretary to government.

Mr. II. T. Prinsep, secretary to government in general department.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort William, Nov. 9, 1827.—37th N. I. Ens. Thos. Hutton to be lieut. from 22d Oct. 1827, v. Kennedy dec.

46th N.I. Licut. Chas. Guthric to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. R. P. Alcock to be lieut., from 3d Nov. 1827, in suc. to J. Johnston dec.

1st Ertra N.I. Ens. J. H. Hatchell to be lieut., from 25th Oct. 1825, v. Pollard dec.

6th Extra N.I. Brev. Capt. and Lieut. Alex Farquharson to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. H. W. Leacock to be lieut., from 6th Nov. 1827, in suc. to Smith dec.

Assist, Surg. C. S. Curling to be surgeon, from 9th Nov. 1827, v. Patterson dec.

Lieut. F. Abbott, of engineers, to be executive engineer of Neemuch division in department of public works, v. Capt. G. Thomson removed.

Cadets D. H. Brodle, C. R. Browne, H. La Mesurler, P. Dick, L. Ross, and C. Slacke, ad-mitted to Inf., and prom. to ensigns. — Mr. G. Sedgley, admitted an assistant surg.

Nov. 16.—65th N.I. Brev. Capt. and Lieut. R. W. Wilson to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. R. L. R. Charteris to be lieut., from 2d Nov. 1827, in suc. to Wollocombe invalided.

69th N.I. Ens. Chas. Corfield to be lieut., from 15th \ug. 1826, v. Rocke struck off.

4th Estra N.I. Ens. P. Abbott to be lieut., from 16th May 1827, v. Tweedale resigned.

Assist. Surg. O. Wray to be surg., v. Hickman re-tired, with rank from 22d Sept. 1827, v. Reddie dec. Cadets F. W. Burkinyoung and Jas Bell admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.

Ens. T. G. Blake, 67th N.I., permitted, at his own request, to resign service of Hon. Company. Lieut. C. Bracken, 45th N.I., to be a sub-assist. in Hon. Company's stud, v. Johnston dec.

Officers appointed to Civil Stations. Capt. II. P. Carleton, 1st Europ. Regt., at Hyderabad, from 12th Oct.—Capt. T. Robinson, 64th N.I., and Capt. P. Johnston, 5th N.I., at Indore, from 26th Oct.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 31, 1827.—Lieut. Col. Com. A. Watson, 7th L.C., app. to temporary command of garrison of Monghyr.

Fort William, Nov. 23.—Licut. R. C. Jenkins, 61st N.I., permitted, at his own request, to resign service of Hon. Company.

Nor. 27.—Lieut. Col. K. Swettenham, invalid estab., nominated to charge of 1st or Burdwan Prov. Bat., during absence of Lieut. Col. Bird.

Nov. 30.—35th N.I. Lieut. C. W. Cowley to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. Chas. Wyndham to be lieut., from 20th Nov. 1827, in suc. to Mercer dec.

61st N.I. Ens. James Marshall to be lieut, from 23d Nov. 1827, v. Jenkıns resigned. Assist. Surg. J. T. Pearson to perform medical duties of civil station of Jessore during absence of Assist. Surg. Francis.

May John Hunter, 58th N.I., to officiate as re-gulating officer of invalid thannahs in district of Behar, during absence of May Spottiswood.

Dec. 3 .- Cadet R. Wright admitted to infantry, and prom to ensign.

Dec. 7.—Infinity. Maj. C. H. Lloyd to be lieut. col., v. Higgins dec., with rank from 3d Sept. 1827, v. Stuart dec.

30th N.I. Capt. A. Shuidam to be mai., Licut. T. M'Sherry to be capt., and Ens. H. Wilkinson to be lieut., from 3d Sept. 1827, v. Lloyd prom.

Capt.E. J. Houeywood, commanding Cov. General's body guard, to be a member of Board of Superintendance for Breed of Cattle.

Lieut. Fred. Grote, regt. of artil., to be an aidede-camp on personal staff of Gov. General, v. Maj. G. S. Crole proceeding to Europe.

Cadet J. J. Poett admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign.

Maj. R. Braddon, 11th L. I., transferred, at his own request, to invalid estab., and app. to Chittagong Prov. Bat.

Veterinary Surg. Jas. Kerr, permitted, at his own request, to resign service of Hon. Company.

own request, to resign service of Hon. Company, 27th N.I. Capt. Ahr. Roberts to be maj, from 28th Nov. 1895, v. Baines prom.; Lieut. E. Suther-land to be capt. of a company, and Ens. R. Craw-ford (resigned) to be lieut., from 20th Nov. 1896, in suc. to Roberts prom.; and Ens. M. Wilson to be lieut. from 30th Dec. 1826, v. Crawford re-stened. signed.

58th N.I. Ens. N. A. Parker to be lieut., v. Baillie retired, with rank from 8th June 1827, v. Turner dec.

Assist. Surg. C. B. Francis to be surg., v. Farquiar retired, with rank from 9th Nov. 1827, v. Patterson dec.

Cadet M. Lushington admitted to cavalry.— Cadet T. C. Barrett admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign.

Capt. F. J. Stainforth, 1st L. C., permitted, at his own request, to resign service of Hon. Com-

Dec. 14.—1st L.C. Lleut. G. R. Crommelin to be capt. of a troop, and Cornet G. Reid to be lieut., from 7th Dec. 1827, in suc. to Stainforth resigned.

11th N.I. Capt. D. G. Scott to be major, Lieut. T. Sewell to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. J. E. Cheetham to be lieut., from 7th Dec. 1827, in sucto Braddon invalided.

49th N.I. Lieut. J. F. Douglas to be capt. of a romp., and Ens. E P. Bryant to be lieut., from 17th Nov. 1827, in suc. to Philips dec.

6th Estra N.I. Ens. H. Cheere to be lieut., from 3d Dec. 1827, v. Kennedy dec.

Surg. Colin Campbell to be surperintending surgeon on estab., v. Reddie dec.

Cadet Wm. Cookson, of cavalry, promoted to cornet.

Cadet C. Tait admitted to infantry, and prom-

Lieut. G. M. Sherer, 57th N.I., to superintend works at Sulkea, lately under charge of Lieut. Jenkins.

Assist. Surg. M. Nisbet, attached to civil station of Shahjehanpore, permitted, at his own request, to return to military branch of service.

Lieut. Col. Com. C. Fagan, 56th N.I., to be adjutant general of army, with a seat at Military and Clothing Boards, v. Lieut. Col. Watson, permitted to proceed to Europe on furlough.

Mr. A. V. Dunlop admitted to service as an assist surgeon.

Dr. 21.—Capt. T. Dickinson, 55th N.I., to be assistant to commissioners in Arracan.

lst Estra N.I. Lient. J. P. Hickman to be capt. of a comp., from 3d July 1827, v. Sim dec.; Ens. J. A. James to be lieut., v. Hickman prom., with rank from 25th Oct 1827, v. Pollard dec.

Lieut, Col. C. H. Lloyd, 30th N.I., transferred, at his own request, to invalid estali, and app. to command of 15th or Bundlecund Prov. Bat.

Head-Quarters, Nov. 20.—Lieut. Dixon to act as adj. to 4.kl N.I., during Lieut. Mackintosh's illuss; dated 31st Oct.

Lieut. Foley to act as adj. to five companies of 10th N.1., ordered on service: dated 9th Nov.

Postings and Removals in Cavalry, Licut. Col. Ariold (lately prom.) to 2d L.C.; Lieut. Col. Read, from 2d to 8th do.; Licut. Col. Hawtiey, from 1th to 2d do.; Licut. Col. Thomson, 1scin 3d to 9th do.; Cornet Siddons (lately prom.), to 2dda, John Turner, from 61st N.I., to medical beatings and Removels in Medical Department. Surg. John Turner, from 61st N.I., to medical charge of 1st and 2d Europ. 1egg at Agra; Surg. Bading, from 2d bat, artillery, to 53d N.I.; Surg. B. Paterson, from 8th to 26th N.I.; Surg. B. W. Mac Leod, from 67th to 8th N.I.; Surg. B. W. Mac Leod, from 67th to 8th N.I.; Surg. C. Scottlery prom.), to 2dd bat, artillery.

Vetermary Surg. G. Sedgley posted to 10th L.C. Assist. Surg. Murray, surgeon to Com.-in-chief, directed to afford medical assistance to officers of general staff at head-quarters, and to assume medi-tal tharge of his Excellency's escort.

Now 30.—Cadets of Cavalry appointed to do duty. C. Y. Bazett and J. M. Loughnan, with 9th L.C., Cawnpore, Wm. Baker, Edw. Taylor, and V. F. T. Turner, 6th do., Sultanpore, Benarcs.

Ensigns appointed to do duty. J. G. B. Paton, with lith N.I., Kurnaul; G. W. Golding, 67th do., Dinapore; Geo. Brockman, 7th do., Berhamlore; Fred. Lloyd, 36th do., Sultanpore (Oude); W. P. Bignell, 19th do., Nusserabad; Fred. Samfer, 46th do., Dinapore; J. G. W. Cuttis, 16th do., Sultampore

-Isiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 149.

(Oude); Thos. Brodle, 40th do., Dhapore; J. N. Marshall, 40th do., Dhapore; T. F. H. Pemberton, 40th do., Dhapore; B. W. R. Jenner, 20th do., Cawnpore; Geo. Rankin, 67th do., Dinapore; D. Gaussen, 26th do., Cawnpore; J. B. Murrell, 67th do., Dhapore.

Dec. 1.—Lieut. Ludlow to act as adj. to artillery dlv. In Rajpootana, v. Lleut. Symons proceeding on sick leave; dated 31st Oct.

Capt. Stoddart, 8th L.C., to officiate as dep. judge adv. gen. to Sirhind div. until arrival of Lieut. Palmer; dated 10th Nov.

Licut. II. McGeorge to officiate as interp. and qu. mast. to 7th N.I., during absence of Lieut. Huddleston; dated 12th Nov.

Doc. 5.—Lleut. Parker, extra ald-de-camp to Commander-in-chief, directed to be borne on establishment as aide-de-camp during Lieut. Col. Dawkin's employment as ald, gen. to H. M.'s forces in India, or until further orders.

Dec. 6.—1st Europ. Regt. Lieut. W. H. Howard to be interp. and qu. mast., v. Matthie.

Rungpore Light Infantry. Lieut. J. Matthle, 1st Europ. Regt., to be adj., v. Kennedy dec.

Capt. G. Thompson, of engineers, directed to join corps of sappers and miners.

Dec. 8.—Assist. Surg. W. Donard posted to 54th N.I.

Surg. R. Brown removed from 33d to 61st N.I. Brev. Capt. and Adj. H. Lawrence permitted, at his own request, to resign adjutancy of 2d Nus-Officere returned to duty, from Europe.—Maj. R. W. Baldock, 35th N.I.; Capt. W. W. Rees, 50th N.I.; Leut. W. W. Fracer, 8th L.C.; and Assist. Surg. T. Inglis; all arrived 6th Nov. 1827.—Lieut. J. R. Birrel, 11th N.I.; arrived 2th Nov.—Lieut. Win. Elliott, 27th N.I.; arrived 2th Nov.—Capt. A. Syme, 57th N.I.; arrived 12th Nov.—Capt. A. Syme, 57th N.I.; arrived 13th Nov.—Lieut. F. Beaty, 1st Europ. Regt.; arrived 2th Nov.—Capt. And. Markende, 15th N.I.; arrived 29th Nov.—Lieut. F. B. Rocke, 5th L.C.; arrived 3d lbr.

HIS MAJISTY'S FORCES.

Head-Quasters, Nov. 25.—Lieut. Col. Dawkins, half pay, unattached, to officiate as adjutant general to H. M.'s army in India until further orders, v. Lieut. Col. Macdonald dec.

FURLOUGHS.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Nov. 9. Capt. John Grant, 69th N.1., for health.—Lieut.T.R. Dalrymple, 7th N.1., for health.—H.6. Lieut. Col. Com. II. Bowen, 5ist N.1., for health.—Lieut. T. R. Peynolds, 62d N.1., for health.—Lieut. R. II. Miles, 1st N.1., for health.—Lieut. R. V. Fenning, 7egl, of artil., for health.—Lieut. J. B. Fenton, 67th N.1., for health.—Lieut. Geo. C. Smith, 3d L.C., for health.—23. Lieut. Col. A. Lindsay, regt. of artil., on private affairs.—Maj. J. T. Baldwing, 22d N.1., on ditto.—Capt. II. B. Henderson, 8th N.1., dep. assist. com. gen., on ditto.—Capt. II. Schoston, 8th N.1., officassist. adp. gen., on ditto.—Lieut. E. S. Lloyd, 49th N.1., for health.—Assist. Surg. J. Logan, for health.—Sol. Lieut. Col. C. Howyer, 69th N.1., for health.—Capt. G. H. Sol., for health.—Lieut. H.T. C. Keir, 39th N.1., supermendent of cadets, for health.—Dec. 7. Lleut. Col. W. C. L. Bird, invalid estab, on private affairs.—Healt. J. Milner, 9th L.C., of thealth.—Lieut. C. H. Wiggins, regt. of artil., for health.—Lieut. C. H. Wiggins, regt. of artil., for health.—Lieut. C. H. Wiggins, e. Capt. J. Barthy, 4th L.C., for health.—Lieut. C. H. Wasson, 7th N.1., adj. gen. of army, on private affairs.—Capt. J. Barthy, 4th L.C., for health.—Lieut. D.C. Keiller, 6th N.1., for health.—Lieut. D.C. Keiller, 6th N.1., for health.—Assist. Surg. G. Smith, for health.—Assist. Lieut. Col. C. H. Baines, 6th N.1., for health.—Assist. Surg. G. Smith, for health.—Assist. Lieut. Col. C. H. Sanchey, 24. P. L. Surg. Con health. P. Lieut. Col. C. H. Sanchey ment.

ment.
To Singapore.—Nov. 23. Ens. T. Ramsay, 22d.
N.I., for six months, for health.
4 S

To Cape of Good Hope.—Nov. 23. Capt. J. M. A. Lucsa, 24th N.I., for health (eventually to Eupe).—Dec., 7. Capt. W. Cunningham, gar, store-keeper of Fort William, for health.—10. Capt. A. Lonas, jat. N.I., for eighteen months for health.—21. Lieut. Col. Com. W. Hopper, regt. of artil., ditto ditto.

LAW.

Supreme Court, November 14, 15, 16.

Rev. Jas. Bryce, D.D. v. Samuel Smith.
This was an action against the proprietor of the Hurkaru newspaper for a libel published in that paper on the 12th March last. as follows:

"Persons unacquainted with the prominent part the Rev. Dr. Bryce takes in the discussion of political questions, and in all those multifarbous topics, with which the editor of a public solitical questions, and in all those multifarbous topics, with which the editor of a public solitic solitic solitic solitical topics, with which the editor of a public solitic solitical topic soli

The plaintiff now demurred to thirteen pleas advanced by the defendant in justifi-

Mr. L. Clarke contended that the pleas were bad in law, and that from their vagueness and generality no issue could be taken on them. It would shorten the business for the court if he stated, that to him it appeared that the thirteen pleas might be divided into three classes; the five first, the four next, and the four last. The five first charged generally, that the plaintiff, being a clergyman, had for two years previous to the publication of the libel been a proprietor of a newspaper and magazine; that he took a prominent part in the discussion of political questions, and in those multifarious topics, in which the editor of a public journal is daily in the habit of dealing, and that he occupied the time which intervened between his stated weekly duties in taking a prominent part, &c. &c. The four next pleas set out certain articles, which, it alleged, were published in the newspaper, of which it was alleged that the plaintiff was proprietor, during a space of two years previous to the publication of the libel, and, in this respect only, was rather less vague than the first class of pleas. The last four pleas he considered to be the same as the first five, except that they introduced a new allegation; namely, "that the plain-tiff was considered and connected with divers persons, to wit, &c. in various mercantile transactions, and purchases of merchandize for sale, which said several pursuits, engagements, and secular employments, in the plea mentioned, were calculated to interfere with the duties of the plaintiff as such minister, in visiting the distressed, instructing the unenlightened, and promoting the general harmony and well-being of his flock." It was true, that every plea varied, but he felt confident he could shew that there were certain objections, which would be found applicable to every one of the five first, another set to the four next, and another to the four last. There were also distinct objections to each, but he should prefer applying the demurrers to the pleas according to these classes.

Some discussion as to the proper course of proceeding here took place between the court and bar.

Mr. Clarke then proceeded in the legal argument, and was followed by Mr. Cleland on the same side; the two gentlemen occupied nearly the whole of the 14th.

The Advocate General then addressed the court on hehalf of the defendant in support of the pleas in justification, contending that the demurrers were not sustainable, He particularly contended, that the rule of law, stated in "Johnson and Stuart," was applicable to this case; namely, that there were several instances, where a general charge was sufficient even in an indictment, such as charges of barratry, or keeping a common bawdy-house, that in 1 Hawk. P. C. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25 and 59 in 2 Atk. 339, it is said, that in the case of an indictment for keeping a common bawdy-house, without charging any particular fact, though the charge be general, yet at the trial the prosecutor may give in evidence particular facts, and the particular time of doing them; the same rule as to keeping a common gaming house. So a general charge for keeping a disorderly house was held sufficient, The learned counsel's 2 Barr. 1232. speech occupied the remainder of the 14th and part of the 15th.

Mr. Dickens, on the same side, on the 16th, argued that the plaintiff could not take advantage of an original defect in the pleadings, and demurred to the declaration itself, on the ground that the publication complained of was not libellous.

Mr. Clarke rose to reply, but was stopped by the court.

The Chief Justice (Sir C. Grey) commenced his judgment by shewing the reason of the different rules of law as applicable to the general issue, and to a justification. He said, that to allow a defendant to put in a justification on vague and general grounds, would be monstrous, and destructive of every principle in the constitution of society. It was a fixed principle of law, that in a justification a defendant is bound to acquaint the plaintiff with the facts which he means to prove, and to put these in an issuable form, with the same certainty which the criminal courts require in an indictment, and with due specification of time, place, and circumstance. His Lordship then read the libel, and said that no man of common sense and acquainted with the English language could affix any other meaning to the sentence—" Yet this man professes to he a follower of Jesus Christ, to walk in his footsteps, &c." than as charging the plaintiff as professing to be a follower of Jesus Christ, whilst he was not so, but the reverse, and, that as a clergyman, he not only neglected his duties, but did what was inconsistent with the character of a clergyman. To justify this libel, it was incumbent on the defendant to shew specifically the nature and quality of the pursuits in which the plaintiff was engaged, and that they were inconsistent with his profession. It is admitted that a Christian may be an editor or proprietor of a periodical publication, and that there is nothing inconsistent in a clergyman being so.

Mr. Turton.-We have not gone that length.

Chief Justice.—It is an absurdity to say herwise. There is perhaps no more effectual means of diffusing knowledge and instructing the ignorant than by periodical publications, and I do not see why I should draw any distinction between a newspaper and any other periodical publication. We have here an allegation, that the plaintiff is proprietor and mauages a newspaper, and enters into political discussions and writes on all those multifarious topics, with which the editor of a public journal is daily in the habit of dealing. There can be nothing more vague than this. It was necessary for the defendant to state what those discussions are. Here he only states that they are political and multifarious. No information is given to the plaintiff. It is absolutely necessary, in a justification of this sort, that we have a specification either of the quantity of time, or of the nature and quality of the writings. We have neither. There is no specification of time; it is merely said that he employed the time that intervened between his stated weekly duties; it is not said whether he employed a quarter of an hour each day or every hour. As to quality there is nothing specifically stated. The only other argument employed by defendant's counsel is, that where employment is general, that the mere charge is sufficient. A case has been put which I was astonished to hear from counsel who come to defend the editor of a newspaper: they have likened this case to that of a keeper of a house of ill-fame, or a common scold.

Mr. Turton.—We did not liken it, my lord: we said the same rule of law was applicable.

Chief Justice. - But it is not applicable; and you must liken it to this case before you can apply it. I cannot bring myself to consider the duties of an editor admit of any such comparison, and it is strange that it should come from those who defend an editor; but the charge of being an editor of a newspaper is not of the same nature surely. I have a different idea of a newspaper proprietor or editor; and certainly not so low an idea, as to think there is any parallel between an imputation of being in that situation, and an imputation of being a common scold, or a keeper of a house of ill-fame. I have known dignitaries of the church of England who have conducted periodical publications with honour to themselves and credit to the country, and I can refer to an instance of it in the British Critic. cannot distinguish between the editor or proprietor of a daily, weekly, or monthly publication. Perhaps the latter may oc-cupy more of the editor's time. There is certainly nothing improper or unbecoming the character of a clergyman in being the conductor of a periodical publication, nor any thing inconsistent with Christianity, or with a follower of that religion being in that situation.

Sir John Franks was of opinion, that the plea was insufficient to justify the charge. The manner in which plaintiff occupied his time is not stated. The rule of law is, that the court must have the fact or instrument charged, specifically before them. His lordship referred to Buller's Nisi Prius. Here the acts charged are not specified, and I am therefore of opinion, that the plea is not sufficient and ought not to be supported. The authorities cited by the counsel for the plaintiff, particularly the case of "J. Anson and Stuart, are most strictly applicable. And while there is a total absence of facts in the plea, it is not possible to aid by intendment. The plaintiff is a clergyman of the church of Scotland, and it is unnecessary to inquire how the time of a clergyman of that church should be employed; it must of course be employed in the same manner as a clergyman of any other church; but while he is charged with misconduct there is no specification of that misconduct, and we cannot aid the plea by intendment. The presumption of law is that the plaintiff performs his duties. The more sacred the duties, the presumption is the stronger that the duties are conscientiously performed: to presume otherwise would be unchristian. The allegation of fact here is insufficient, and not to be aided. I am of opinion that the demurrer is good.

Sir Edward Ryan.—I am of the same opinion. It is clearly not a good plea. It was clear that the sting of the libel was in the last paragraph. He agreed with the Chief Justice, that the defendant ought either to have pointed out the quantity of time employed, or the quality or nature of the writings inconsistent with Christianity. thought the libel referred more to the nature of the writings, than to the time employed. The libel commenced with-" Persons unacquainted with the nature, '-Again: "the reverse of the medal, &c.," if it meant any thing, could only mean that the plaintiff's conduct was the reverse of what a clergyman's should be. Though it must be admitted that the libel was rather unintelligible in some parts, and indeed, according to strict criticism, perfect nonsense; yet the author had used words which left no doubt as to his meaning; but on the whole he thought it referred to the nature of the writings; but look at the time-there is no specification -it may be weekly or monthly. plaintiff might have proceeded by indictment: his only object in preferring this method must have been to clear his character, by leaving the defendant to prove the truth.

the

Mr. Turton said, that was generally taken as the reason at home, but it was different here. If the plaintiff had proceeded by indictment it must have gone to a jury, which the plaintiff's object was to avoid.

Sir Edward Ryan. — I don't think so.

(A conversation here took place between
Mr. Turton and the Chief Justice on this point.)

Sir Edward Ryan.—It is clear, that the time employed is not sufficiently specified. And as to the nature of the writing or employment, nothing could be more wide. It is impossible the plaintiff could know how or what to defend. The demurrer must be allowed.

December 14.

Afauk Moy, Lumjaw, and Alowp, three Chinese, were convicted of the murder of one of their countrymen, named Loaung, on the 12th August. They were to be executed on the 7th January, along with Atlang, a Malay, convicted on the 15th Dec. of the murder of another Chinese.

December 18.

At the general gaol delivery this day, Rampersaud Ghose, committed for perjury, on appearing to justify bail (see p. 506), was sentenced to seven years' transportation; and John Cornclus Ham and Jane Higgins, convicted of a cruel assault on a poor female who resided with them (see vol. xxiv. p. 598), were discharged, owing to their inability to pay the fine imposed by the court; the judge recommended the latter to make some provision for the victim of their acts.

The foreman of the grand jury, at the close of their labours, delivered an address to the bench which, it is alleged in the Government Gazette, was dissented from by a "large proportion" of the jury, wherein a complaint was made against the costs of law proceedings and the exorbitance of the fees paid to the officers of the court. The Chief Justice delivered a long speech in reply, observing, that although he concurred in most of the opinions expressed in the address, yet it was a mode of application not recognized by law; and although he was desirous of improving the constitution of the court, and did so, as opportunities occurred, he could not pledge himself to attempt such a general inquiry as was suggested in the address. When such an inquiry became necessary, it was specially provided for by the Legislature in the 37th Geo. III. c. 142, sec. 5. and the Court of Directors were empowered to call upon the Chief Justice to institute an inquiry, which was to be completed in concurrence with the government.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Irawadi steam-vessel returned to the presidency on Friday last from Inapoon, having on board bullion in value between eleven and twelve lacs, in part of the third instalment of twenty-five lacs; the rest was in course of collection. The Enterprize arrived in the Rangoon river on the day that the Irawadi quitted, the 10th, and was to proceed for orders to Moal Mein. We are happy to learn that the best possible understanding continue to prevail between the British and Burman authorities, and the Woongyee shews every disposition to maintain a friendly intercourse.

Mr. Maingy, the commissioner, had arrived at Moal Mein, and had visited a harbour reported to exist on the Palagyoon side of the river. The troops at Moal Mein continued unusually healthy, although the rainy season had been extraordinary server.—Cal. Can. Cag., 10ct. 22.

vere.—Cal. Gov. Gaz., Oct. 22.

A survey of the old channel leading direct to Moal Mein, had been made in the beginning of September; it was found to be from five to six hundred yards broad, with a depth, in general, of five to three fathoms at low water, and free from rocks. On the right bank of the united stream, about seven miles below Moal Mein, on the Palagyoon side of the river, an excellent side has been discovered for a harbour and for the construction of docks. The facilities of access thus discovered will, no doubt, tend to improve the navigation and resources of Moal Mein.—Id. Oct. 25.

EXCURSION INTO TARTARY.

We have lately been favoured with some notices notices of a visit lately made to the pass of ()ota Dhoora, on the Jawahir frontier. which had never been before visited by any Europeans. It lies on the road to Gertokh, the principal frontier mart, and about a day's march beyond Milam, the northernmost station of the Jawahir Bhoteas. Capt. Herbert, the superintendent of the mineralogical survey in the Himalaya, after having reached Milam, over a most difficult and dangerous route, was prevented from proceeding by indisposition; but his assistant, Capt. Monson, advanced to the pass, which proved to be the loftiest yet visited, being 17,780 feet above the sea. Between this and Gertokh there are several ridges, of nearly equal elevation, to be crossed, and the whole is destitute of vegetation, the road being, for one march on this side of the pass, more than 1,000 feet above the line at which shrubs of any kind are found. The road is practicable only for about two months in the year; during the rest it is blocked up by snow. Notwithstanding the difficulties of the journey, however, the pass is the most frequented throughout the whole range by the Tartar traders. It is computed that above 7,000 sheep, the only beasts of burthen used in the Himalaya, pass over this mountain annually, importing about nine or ten thousand maunds of salt and borax. -Cal. Gov. Gaz., Dec. 3.

TEMPERATURE OF MANIPUR.

We have been favoured with registers of the temperature at Manipur for the months of June, July, and August last: they show a sensible difference from the climate we experience in Calcutta during the same period, and leave no doubt of the benefit Manipur derives from its elevation above the sea of 2,634 feet. In the middle of June, the highest range of the thermometer was from 87° to 90°, but it immediately fell, and throughout July and August is 78°—Cal. Gov. Gaz., Oct. 18.

NAUTICAL NOTICE.

Extract from the log of the George Canning, Clark, from London:

The ship George Canning, on the 17th September 1827, 3 P.M., civil time, steering S.E. by. E. fresh gale from westward, observed the water decidedly of a greenish coat, as if we were in sounding latitude, the preceding noon, 39° 40′ S., long. 26° 43′ E., by lunar observation of the 15th inst., brought forward by chronometer. At 8 A.M. of the 18th September, the officers remarked to me they thought we were in soundings; the water was then much more discoloured than the day before. At noon we hove to, and sounded in 88 fathoms; very fine sand with some reddish specks. I am of opinion, if we sounded at 8 A.M., we should have had less water, as the water was most discoloured at that time; but having found the thermometer 5° higher in the water than in the sir, was what hindered me from heaving-to at 8 o'clock. At 5 r.M. sounded to again, and struck bottom at 100 fathoms, hard rocky bottom, with rotten ground; the water at that time had nearly resumed its dark blue colour again. I have called this Canning Bank, and have no doubt of the position being nearly correct, as having made the island of Amsterdam and St. Paul on the 5th October; our chronometer was ten miles to eastward, and lunar one to westward.

(Signed) JAMES CLARK, Commander.

CIVIL SERVICE ANNUITY FUND.

The following extracts from a despatch received from the Hon. Court of Directors, under date 30th May 1827, are published for the information of the subscribers to the Civil Service Annuity Fund.

By order of the Managers, J. A. Dobin, Sec. Civil Service Annuity Fund Office, Nov. 8, 1827.

Recommendation of the Fund Committee, that civil servants, after a residence of twenty years, if absolutely prevented by illness from completing the required term of twenty-two years, should be deemed qualified to accept annuities.

"We cannot acquiesce in this recommendation, because we consider it necessary strictly to adhere to that clause of the regulations which prescribes, as the indispensable qualification of an annuitant, that he shall have been twenty-five years in the civil service, and have resided in India, in that service, the full term of twentytwo years."

As to the time passed at Hertford College.
"The period of service commences with the date of appointment as a writer. The period of residence from the date of arrival at the presidency; consequently, no part of the time passed at the college of Haileybury can be computed in the period either of service or of residence."

As to the period when a civil servant should be called upon to decide whether or not to accept the annuity, and also as to the date from which the annuity should commence.

"In framing the regulations and calculations of the fund, we deemed it expedient to fix a uniform period at which the annuities should commence; the 1st of May in each year was accordingly fixed, that being the date at which all our other financial transactions are considered to begin. It is now proposed, that 'any member about to retire on the annuity, and so desirous, shall be permitted to resign the service, on any day of the six months pravious to the 1st of May of each year, and at the expiration of the said official year, shall be entitled to draw an annuity, increased by a sum proportionate to the period that shall have elapsed between the date of his resignation and the 1st of May of such year, his payment to be proporsionately increased so as to cover the broken period; but as the adoption of this suggestion would not only tend to complicate the accounts of the Fund, but would also subject us to an additional charge for so much of the annuities, previously to the 1st of May, as would be derived from our contribution to the Fund. we must decline to acquiesce in the proposed arrangement. We have no objecjection to the 1st of November being fixed as the date upon which servants having had the first offer of annuities, to commence on the first of the following May, and not baving signified their acceptance of such annuities, shall be considered to have relinquished all claims to them for that year.

"It is unnecessary to make any alteration in the regulation which requires, that a servant having signified his acceptance of an annuity, shall, nevertheless, forfeit his right to it if he fail to resign the service on or before the 1st of July of the year with which the annuity may be appointed to commence."

Declaration of the acceptance of an annuity to be upon honour.

"We approve of the proposed regulation requiring that "declaration of the willingness of any subscriber to take the annuity shall be stated upon honour."

Proposed clause to allow the Court to appoint annuitants members of Council.

"It is quite unnecessary to make this provision; nothing in the regulations of the Annuity Fund can preclude us from appointing, as members of council, any persons possessing the qualifications prescribed by the Legislature."

Appointment of managers.

"We do not object to the proposed addition to the 17th clause, viz. 'the managers shall be elected at a general meeting, to be holden on the 1st day of January in each year;' it being always understood, that it is not competent to the general meeting to disturb the arrangement provided for in the former part of the clause, by which four of the nine managers are 'ex-officio the chief secretary to Government, the accountant-general, the subtreasurer, and the civil auditor.' Upon the resolution of the general meeting, 'that Messrs, Coutts and Co. be trustees and agents in England for the Civil Service Annuity Fund,' we have no objection to offer to the proposed appointment, nor any observation to make upon it, further than that, according to the present form of certificates given by the managers, we have no authority to make payments on account of the Fund to any other persons than to the annuitants, or to agents duly constituted by them individually."

It has been announced that a meeting of members, already advertised for the 1st January, will be special, for the purpose of taking into consideration, and eventually submitting for the approval of the Hon. Court of Directors the following proposition, viz.

"That those members of the civil service (thirteen in number), who declined subscribing to the Annuty Fund; on the tender being made to them, shall again have the option of subscribing on payment of arrears of subscription from the 1st of May 1825."

ROPE BRIDGES OF SUSPENSION,

The Calcutta Gazette, adverting to the accident recorded in p. 514, by the breaking of a sangah, or torrent-bridge, states: "We understand there are now four rope bridges erected over rivers in Almorah, differing in span from 130 to 175 feet, These are, one at Hawul Bagh, over the Kossilah, at the station of Kemaon, built in 1825; and three others, erected in the past season, over the Bulleah, the Ramgur, and the Sawul rivers, which intersect the high dak road from Almorah to the plains. These structures are in substitution of wooden bridges, hitherto built at a considerable charge to Government, and which have always failed from the rapidity of the torrents, and the nature of the soil. The present rope bridges were all constructed by engineers, after a model sent for the purpose, and ultimately surveyed and reported on by a committee of officers, for the satisfaction of Government, and others of large dimensions are in progress. The executive officer of the division is also in charge of these structures, now so universally adopted in India."

ENTERTAINMENT ON BOARD A FRENCH CORVETTE.

On Saturday evening, we understand that Captain Fabré, commanding his most Christian Majesty's corvette Chevrette, entertained a large dinner party on board that vessel. Dinner was laid out on the quarter-deck under the awning; and festoons of leaves and flowers were tastefully suspended all round, which had a very pleasing effect. The viands were of the choicest French and English cookery, and the wines of the best kind. Nothing could exceed the cordial and polite attentions of Captain Fabré and the other officers of the Chevrette to their guests. After dinner, a bumper toast having been called for by Captain Fabre, we need scarcely say with what unanimous cordiality of feeling it was drunk, when it was announced as "the health of the King of France and the King of France and the King of England." The cheers of the company had hardly subsided, when a salvo of cannon crowned the honour of the toast, which, to those who were not in the secret of such an accompaniment, had a novel, if not startling effect. A number of excellent songs were afterwards sung, and the party did not separate until a late hour. The Chewrette is a beautiful model of a vessel. She is kept in high trim; and her crew are a fine looking set of young fellows, who carry in their appearance that air of cheerful and good health which is the best sign of their being carefully disciplined and ably looked after.— Cal. John Bull, Nov. 26.

CURE FOR THE CHOLERA.

The Timira Nasuk, a native paper, communicates the following important intelligence:—" It is with extreme gratification we learn that, in order to put a stop to the ravages of cholera, several excellent persons have caused figures of Smasan Kali (or Kali, the goddess of cemeteries) to be set up in various places and worshipped. The worship began with the new moon: further particulars we are unable to give at present."

PETITION TO THE LEGISLATURE.

The Government Gazette, we observe, is accused by the radicals of speculating on the topics of political economy as applicable to the existing state of things in British India, with the object of deterring "sober men from signing the petition now lying at the Town Hall." We cannot, of course, answer for our cotemporary's object, but we are enabled to state from ocular inspection of that document, that many "sober men" are deterred, some how or other, from signing it. A useful hint, however, has been thrown out by the radicals themselves, on which we are enabled to improve not a little, about a counter-petition. Such a counter-petition, we believe, is now in progress; not so much with a view, however, as we are informed, of meeting any evils apprehended from the sugar question, which is sufficiently milk-and-water on the subjects of coloni. zation and transmission, that even the opponents of these measures may sign it with a safe conscience, as we observe several have done, as to bring the Legislature at home acquainted with the real sentiments of the natives of India, who are mainly concerned in these measures. It has, indeed, been the policy of the radicals hitherto to represent the natives of this country as most desirous of the introduction of more European "skill and industry " among them; and as regarding themselves sorely aggrieved, because restrictions on a the resort to and residence in India" of Europeans should not have been taken away long ago. But as the position would be monstrous and unnatural, so also is it most unfounded in truth; as the poverty of native names to the petition "now lying at the Town Hall" fairly indicates; and as the thousand for one names that will assuredly be appended to the counter-petition will fully demonstrate; to the utter confusion of our radicals; colonizationists, and non-transmissionists, bere and elsewhere. — Cal. John Bull, Dec. 1.

GOLD IN THE IRAWADI.

In the visit of Lieut, Alexander to the Burman kingdom, we observe a fact stated; which we apprehend has escaped the notice of all who have, before or since, visited that part of the world, although well worthly of their attention. He remarks, that "from the mud of the river (the Irawadi) in any part of its course, from ten to twelve per cent. of gold dust may be washed." We marvel that our countrymen missed so splendid an opportunity of enriching themselves, or that the authorities did not send round a few ship-loads of this mud, as some indemnification for the expenses of the war.—Cal. Gov. Gaz., Oct. 15.

NATIVE JURIES.

The Calcutta Government Gazette, in commenting upon an article in a Scotch paper, the editor of which, from his own knowledge, declares, that the natives of India are exceedingly desirous of the introduction of the trial by jury amongst them; that the objections made by them on the score of imperfect knowledge of the English language are "mere fudge," and never entered the head nor escaped the lips of any native Indian who had not been tampered with; and that the sole difficulties rested with the Government, although the servile state of the Calcutta press gave a false colouring to the whole matter; observes: "It is not our province to comment upon any measures of the Government of this country, although, we believe, they rarely require vindication. or defence; but in the present instance, we much doubt, that the matter ever came under their consideration, and we are quite satisfied that no impediments were ever thrown, directly or indirectly, in the way of a regulation which had received the sanction of the home authorities, and which, whatever may be thought of it in England, is a matter of extreme indifference here. As far as it may facilitate the administration of justice, it will, no doubt, be regarded as desirable: what other character can be given to it we are at a loss to understand. We are at no loss, however, to understand why it should not be palatable to our native friends. Serving on juries may be a privilege, but it is neither a pleasure nor a profit. When to the inconveniences common to all are added the timidity of the native character, the interference of native practices and prejudices, the incompatibility of their habits and faith with some of a juryman's duties, their dependent stations in some instances, the value of their time in others, and the sense of degradation that would be felt by all fit to perform the service, in being put upon a petty jury, and finally, their inability to follow accurately the pleadings of counsel and conclusions of the judge, we need not wonder that they should, without any prompting or unfair bias, disclaim that, which although meant as a boon, is an infliction of a penalty. We have had opportunities of knowing their uninfluenced sentiments on the subject, and are satisfied that their objections are spontaneous, and with one or two exceptions, which were to be anticipated, universal. We do not, however, imagine that the difficulties are insurmountable; and had the regulation begun at the right end, had the grand jury been opened to the best educated and most respectable of the native community, it is likely that both juries would, in time, have been cheerfully as well as competently supplied. As it is, the only means of recommending the petty jury to native feeling, is to pay the individuals liberally for their attendance,"

DROUGHT IN THE INTERIOR.

A correspondent in one of the Calcutta papers, who signs his letter, dated Had-jeepore, Nov. 10, "A Planter," gives the following account of the state of cultivavation in the Upper Provinces:-" The periodical rains in this and the adjoining province of Benarcs (I know not how much further it may have extended) were unsually scanty throughout the whole season, but more especially during the latter part, when they were most required, and, when I assure you that we have scarcely had a shower of rain since the beginning of September, you will not be surprised when I tell you, that the country is literally burnt up; the rice crops are almost entirely destroyed. The sugarcane and all other crops, now standing, much in the same predicament, and as for the rubbee crop, even at this advanced period of the season, there is scarcely yet a field sown. Indeed the cultivators might as well scatter their seed on a gridiron just now as on the ground, and with an equally promising expectation of a return. The poppy lands too, by which this place is surrounded, and which fall more immediately under the inspection of its visitors, afford abundant indications of what is to be expected from them. I don't know what John Company and Duke Ho will say to this, though it is a matter of very little consequence to the community at large, compared with those products which form the staff of life: however, as I see, by an extra gazette. just come into camp, that the opium sales are soon to take place in Calcutta, it may be as well to let the dealers and speculators in this article (who poison half the Chinese and Malay population every year by this odious traffic) know, what is to be expected from the crop of the present season, for I verily believe that this, as well as every other article produced from mother earth, will, in these parts at least, not only fail this year to an extent hitherto unexperienced, but that unless a speedy and abundant fall of rain comes down (of which there is not the smallest appearance at present) something not far from famine will be the consequence."

APPRENTICING SOCIETY.

This Society, instituted in 1825, with the view of apprenticing indigent Christian youth to trade or naval occupations, is, it appears from an address from the the secretaries, in a state of stagnation for want of funds. The subscriptions and donations realized since the beginning of the year amounted to 9,063 rupees, while expenditure has been 18,284 rupees.

AFFRAY IN THE LOLL BAZAR.

A serious disturbance took place on Sunday evening, between four and five, at the Loll Bazar. It appears that a party of sailors, belonging to H. M.'s ship Herald, were carousing at a liquor shop. In the same shop were also some of the crew of merchant vessels, between whom an altercation took place, one party accusing the other of "drinking on them." A man of the name of Wilkinson had been drinking at the shop to the value of two rupees, which he refused to pay, and insisted on having a further supply of liquor. The native of the shop, perceiving that his guest was likely to become troublesome, formed the resolution of clearing the place of his visitors, whose conduct was now becoming disorderly. In pursuance of this determination Serjeant Hurra was applied to, and the doors were closed against intruders: as soon as that measure was effected Wilkinson, however returned with an accession of numbers, and burst the doors open. Serjeant Hurra, who was again applied to by the proprietor of the shop, returned attended by some sepoys, and, on attempting to seize Wilkinson, was kicked into the drain. Information being sent to Mr. Maccan, he hastened to the scene of disturbance with a guard of sepoys, walked into the midst of the rioters, and laid hold on Wilkinson, who had been prior to this taken into custody but rescued. On

Mr. Meccan's seising him, he atruck him on the breast, which staggered that officer. Some blows were exchanged between them, when he was attacked on all sides by sticks. The guard of sepoys, who in the meanwhile desisted from meddling, otherwise than in assisting to secure the principal offender, was assailed with brickbats in various directions. The number of sailors so greatly increased, that there could not by this time have been assembled less than 200 of them, who took an active part against the sepoys and serieants. Wilkinson was taken and retaken six different times, but at last was secured: the disturbance however did not end with his being taken away into safe custody: the fury of the rioters, on the contrary, increased, and many of those engaged have been injured, and some seriously. Mr. Maccan had (in order to prevent, as much as possible, any serious injuries or dangerous retaliation, which, perhaps, could not, in the moment of resentment, have been altogether prevented, had the sepoys been provided with heavier weapous) used the precaution to arm them only with canes. In the heat of the engagement, however, some of them in self-defence were compelled to follow the example of their opponents, and detach sticks from the neighbouring huts. A considerable number of the rioters are now in custody. - Beng. Hurk., Dec. 18.

BEEF-STEAK CLUB.

We understand that a revival of the Beef-Steak Club took place at the Chowninghee Theatre, on Tucsday evening last, when a numerous party assembled to effect its resuscitation. By boarding over the pit a spacious saloon has been formed well adapted to public entertainments.—Cal. Gov. Gaz., Nov. 22.

SICKNESS AT AKYAB.

A letter from Akyab, of the 14th iust., states the troops at that station to be very unhealthy. Out of one corps (the 52d N.I.) of 253, 250 are in hospital, only one subadar, one jemadar, and one scroy being effective. The disease which principally afflicts the men is a burning of the hands and feet, similar to what they suffered last year, and which, although not attended with much danger, is both painful and weakening. A company of the 68th N.I., which is also at the station, does not appear to have suffered to the same extent; as they have only eight men in hospital, of whom six are afflicted with the burning of the extremities. No medicine appears to have any effect in relieving or abating the complaint; even the medicines which were found efficacious last year have this year been found to fail. The medical men seem disposed Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No.149.

to attribute this complaint to the cold nights and mornings, and the great heat of the sun through the day, which, beating on the swamps in the neighbourhood, generates noxious effluvia.—Cal. John Bull, Nov. 28.

NATIVE PAPERS.

Jaypur, Nov. 26.—Advices from this place extend to the 30th of October. In consequence of having fallen into great arrears a general insurrection of the troops had taken place. Leaving their cantonments they assembled in great numbers in the subvusof the city. Two battalions, the officers of which were the voice of the malcontents, being ordered to deliver up their arms and disband the rest, returned to their duty after receiving their arrears.

Despatches had been received by Rao Chand from Zalim Sinh of Upanara, requiring his assistance against an expected attack of the Nawab Mir Khan. The Nawab had commenced constructing a fort, two coss from Upanara, against which Zalim Sinh had expostulated. The Nawab, nevertheless, proceeding with the work, a party had been sent to demolish it, which they effected, after a smart encounter, with a detachment appointed to its defence, in which about 200 were killed and wounded. Mir Khan, on hearing of the defeat of his people and the demolition of his fort, had collected a stronger force, to oppose which Zalim Sinh urgently solicited the advance of the army of the Rao. - Jami Jehan Numa.

Delhi. - On the 4th of November, in Delhi.—On the 4th of November, in consequence of the lunar eclipse, his majesty was weighed in the royal scales (against articles distributed in alms), and the religious men of Mathura were admitted to offer their benedictions.—Ibid.

Peshawer.—Conformably to the letters of Maharaja Runjit Sinh, the Hakem of this place has relinquished the territories of the Ruler of Dereh Samarkand. On the 22d of October Mir Mohummed Khan, the associate of the Chief of Dereh Khaiber, encamped near Peshawer, on his way to Lahore. From Jelalabad advices arrived that the Musselmans, who had assembled in that quarter, were suffering much distress and in utter want of supplies. From Cabul letters stated, that the king had taken the field, and encamped without the city with a force of 1,500 horse and foot.—Ibid.

Maharaja Janaki Rao Sindhia. On the eleventh, the resident held council with the rajn, Hindu Rao, and the Baiza Bai for the settlement of affairs. Apa Sahet, with his uncle Patenkar and his troopers, came to sit in dhurna at the palace, when the guard opposed them; an affray ensued, in which several persons were wounded. Mr. Jacob suppressed the disturbance, and placed one of his battalions and a party of 4 T horse on guard. The Bai sent Hindu Rao to Apa Saheb to expostulate with him, and to express her fear lest he should receive any harm in such conflicts: when all expostulation proved vain, the Bala and Baiza Bais, with the raja, resolved, that if Apa Saheb would reduce his de-mands to one-half, the raja should comply, and he might reside at court. If not, he should go to Poona with Patenkur, who was the chief mover of these insubordinate and riotous proceedings .- [ Ibid.

Maharaja Runjit Sinh .-- On the 20th of October his highness, after bathing in the Táran Taran reservoir, presented a tent and other donations to the shrine of Srinath. and also directed 4,000 rupees to be divided amongst the Brahmans of Amritser. It was reported to the Maliataja, that there were 30,000 fakirs amongst the strangers, who had come to the Mela at Amritser; on which he observed it was proper to pay them respect, and directed that they should be all treated as guests of the state for one day. On the 21st the sirdars presented gifts on occasion of the Dewali; an honorary dress was conferred on Aziz Addin khan, and orders were given to distribute three lacs of rupees to the army, and to despatch to Rawel Pindi. Application for reinforcement, to the extent of 3,000 men, having been made by the killadar of Khairabad, an order was sent to the governor of Aket to supply them, and orders were sent to the ruler of Rawel Pindi to prepare grain and fodder for the army which was ordered into his district.-[Ibid.

CONFLAGRATION OF THE JAHN RAZAR.

We have to notice the complete destruction by fire, for a second time within these seven months, of the Jaun bazar. This took place on the evening of Sunday and morning of Monday last. We have learned nothing of its origin; but the frequent destructions of property by fire ought to shew the necessity of building bazars of something better calculated to resist a conflagration than mere mats. We do not see why the same rule which is observed at Madras should not be enforced in Calcutta, of allowing no houses, unless of brick and chunam, being erected within the city .- [Cal. John Bull, Nov. 28.

PETITION AGAINST COLONIZATION.

In consequence of a few European gentlemen wing called on the Legislature to take into consideration the expediency of granting a more unrestricted residence in India to British subjects, in which prayer they have been joined by a few natives, the zemindars, talookdars, and landholders of Bengal are also meditating an application to parliament " to take into consideration the expediency and policy of not granting any easier resort to, or residence in this country to British subjects than now exists."—[Ibid, Dec. 24.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals in the River.

Arrivals in the River.

Non. 24. Cartha, Lindsay, from Greenock.—08.
George Cunning. Clark, from London; and General Barnes, Baten, from Ceylou.—27. Ledy, Flora, Fayrer, from London.—30. La Lueis, Guragnon, from Marseilles.—Dec. I. Baretto, Junier, Shannon, and Parmella, Wimble, both from London.—4. Ripley, Hesse, from Liverpool: and Phensis, Arthur, from Batavia and Penang.—5. Elphinstone, Atkinson, Carnarven, Winspear, Henry Procher, Jeffery, and Warrer Hastings, Mason, all from London.—7. Diadem, Wilson, from London.—9. Catherise, MacKintosh, from London.—19. Penang Merchant, Mitchenson, from Singapon.—21. Sheburne, White, from China; H. C.'s steam-vessel Enterprize, Johnsone, from Rangoon; and French ship Maddine, from London; and American brig Brahmin, Leish, from Madleria.—23. York, Wilshisson, from London; Roberts, Corlyn, Collinson, from London; Bombay; and Calcutta, Mollen, from London. from Liverpool.—29. Neptune, Cumberledge, from Bombay; and Calcutta, Mollen, from Lon.

Departures from Calcutta.

Departures from Calcutta.

Non. 21. Bengel, Alkinson, for Cape and London.—23. Abin Taylor, Alkinson, for Liverpool.
—24. Eliza, Dixon, for Isle of France: and Amy, Worthington, for China.—25. Grecian, Smith, for Isle of France.—29. Fergusson, Groves, for London; and Smyrna. Kendall, for Boston—Dec. 2. Protector, Waugh, and Cazar, Watt, both for London.—6. Tigress, Sherriff, for Glasgow.—7. Repal George, Reynolds, for London.—9. Grecian, Allen, for Bombay; and Duke of Lancaster, Hanney, for Liverpool.—11. John, Freeman, for Mauritius; and Amorah, for China.—15. Lady M'Naughten, Faith, for London.—16. Chongua, Doret, for Have de Grace.—20. Caproy, M'Gill, for Liverpool; Habe, Heavilde, Gro Ceylon; Frances Wurder, Webster, for Perslan Guil; and Gomcalves, Bache, for Bedester, or Perslan Guil; and Gomcalves, Bache, for Bedester, Perslan Guil; and Gomcalves, Bache, for Bedester, Perslan Guil; and Comcalves, Bache, for Bedester, Carbon, Christopherson, for London.—28. Marquu Landourne, Nives, for Muscat.—28. Cam Brae Castr, Davey, for London; and La Navuy, Guezeneck, for Bordeaux.

BIRTHS.

Sept. 10. At Baitool, the lady of Lieut. Bur-wes, 45th N.I., of a daughter. 11. At Ghazeepore, the lady of R. M. Bird, Esq.,

of a son.

Ort. 24. At Tavoy, the lady of Capt. H. Burney, late envoy to Siam, of a son.
28. At Moulmyn, the lady of Capt. W. Moore,
11. M.*a 45th regt., of a son.
30. At Agra, the lady of Mr. W. Campbell, sen, of the Custom-house, of a son.
Non. 3. At Sulkea, the lady of Geo. Wise, Esq. of a daughter.

8. At Poorneah, the lady of Wm. Duff, Esq.,
Indigo planter, of a son.

— At Poorneah, the lady of B. R. Petry, Esq.,
of a son.

10. At Kabeer Factory, Purneah, Mrs. C. Jadowing, of a daughter.

— At Futtehpore, Mrs. J. Delmedric, of a son

11. At Seetapore, Oude, the lady of Major Mark Webber, 34th regt., of a daughter. 16. The lady of Wm. Fox. Esq., of a daughter. At Mirzapore, the lady of Lleut. G. R. Cron-— At Mizapore, the lady of Lieut, G. R. Clomelin, of a daughter.

— At the general hospital, Calcutta, Mrs. E. R. George, of a daughter.

17. At Cawnpore, the lady of Major H. Roberts, oth L.C., of a daughter.

— Mrs. C. Cornelius, jun., of a daughter.

17.

17. Mrs. A. Nazar, of a son.

Mrs. S. A. Baine, of adaughter.

H. A. Poossh, the lady of Capt. Halles, of the H. C's stud, of a son.

18. At Mirzapore, the lady of Lieut. J. A. Scott, lat L.C., of a son.

B. A. Mirzapore, the lady of Lieut. J. A. Scott, ist. L.C., of a son.

At Lucknow, the lady of Capt. J. Smalpage, brigade major, of a daughter.

19. At Leharpore, the lady of Capt. John Oliver, sub-assist. to H.C.'s stud, of a daughter.

At Ballygunge, Mrs. J. Hughes, of a son.

At Cawrpore, the lady of Capt. Johnson, commissioner at Bittoor, of a son.

The lady of G. P. Bagram, Eag, of a son.

21. At Burtisaul, the lady of W. N. Garrett, Eaq., civil service, of a daughter.

The lady of W. Wonder, Eaq., of a son.

The lady of W. Wonder, Eaq., of a son.

The lady of W. V. Hathorn, Esq., civil service, of a son.

vice, of a soul D'Mello, of a daughter.

23. At the general hospital, the lady of Dr.
Mouatt, M.D., surgeon, H.M.'s 14th foot, of a daughte At Chowringhee, the lady of G. Chester, Esq., of a son.

4. At Chowringhee, the lady of Major J. L. Gale, of a son.

Gale, of a son.

At Bauleah, the lady of G. G. McPherson,
Esp., of a daughter.
Si. In camp, at Kurrah, the lady of Lleut.Col.
Nott, commanding 3d regt., of a son.

Mrs. R. Fermle, wife of Mr. J. Fermle, an asitant of the Hindoo college, of a daughter.

Mrs. P. Boezalt, of a daughter.

At Dum-Dum, the lady of Capt. Debrett, of adaughter.

— At Dum-Dum, the lady of Capt. Debrett, of alsaughter.

27. The lady of D. Carmichael Smyth, Esq., civil service, of a daughter.

— At Chowringhee, the lady of the Rev. Thos. Robinson, chaplain to the Right Hon. the Governor General, of a daughter.

28. Mrs. W. Reed, of a son and heir.

— At Mynpoory, in Zillah Etawah, the lady of Mr. Gr. F. Smith (head assistant in the collecture of th Mr. G. F. F. Smitt (nead assistant in the collector's office), of a son.

Der. J. At Ghazeepore, the lady of W. Lowther, Esq., civil service, of a son.

2. Mrs. E. Bell, of a daughter.

4. At Meerut, the lady of Capt. A. Dickson, 60th

4. At Meerut, the lady of Capt. A. Dicksoni, wantegt, of a son.

— At Dum-Dum, the lady of Capt. G. G. Denniss, of artillery, of a son.

5. At Moulmyn, the lady of G. S. Whitlock, Esq., II.M.'s 36th regt., of a son.

— At Barrally, the lady of Capt. Satchwell, assist. com. gen., of a son.

— At Barrackpore, the lady of Capt. Dundas, of a son.

of a son.

Mrs. W. Hogan, of a son.
6. Mrs. J. D'Silva, sen., of a daughter.
7. At Suckeroleeah Factory, near Purneea, Mrs.
Win. Botellho, of a daughter.

Mrs. T. Haker, wife of Mr. T. Baker, stable-keper, of a daughter.

The lady of S. Nicolson, Esq., of a daughter.

9. At Ghazeepore, the lady of H. G. Tuckett, Fsq., II.M.'s 11th Lt. Drags, of a daughter. — Mrs. J. S. Jebb, of a daughter. II. At Meerut, the lady of Lleut. O'Gormann, Il.M.'s 31st regt, of a daughter. 12. The lady of Lieut. P. T. Ilewitt, Nizam's STVice. of a son.

service, of a son.

14. At Futthpore, the lady of A. F. Lind, Esq., civil scrvice, of a daughter, still-born.

— Mrs. A. Courage, of a son.

15. The lady of it. Fleming. Esq., surgeon, of 18. The lady of N. Hudson, Esq., of a son.

26. Mrs. Ingles, of a daughter.

The lady of G. Vrlgnon, Esq., of a daugh-

Mrs. W. J. Bampton, of a son. 26. Mrs. G. A. Popham, of a daughter. Lately. At Simla, the lady of G. Gavan, Esq., Bengal Medical Establishment, of a son.

MARRIAGE.

Nov. 8. At Mynpoory, Lieut. and Adj. A. Wheat-ley, 5th L.C., to Charlotte, sixth daughter of Brigadler G. Richards, commanding in Bundlecund.

17. At Mullye, Lieut. N. J. Cumberlege, adj.
6th Extra N.1., to Lucy, eldest daughter of Lieut.
Col. J. H. Cave, commanding at Mullye.
19. Mr. T. Black, to Miss E. A. Salmon.
20. At St. John's Catherla, Calcutta, John Hugbes, Ean, attorney at law, to Matlida Sarah, only daughter of the late Major John Moore, H.
M. J. 12th. Col.
M. St. Market St. Miss. A. Forwick.

21. Rev. W. Kirkpatrick, to Miss A. Fenwick, both of Howrah, both of Howrah.

26. Mr. James Black, branch pilot in H.C.'s marine, to Miss A. M. Phipps.

27. Mr. John George, indigo planter, Jessore, to Amelia, daughter of Mr. Robert Kerr.

19ec. 3. Mr. W. Rodney, H.C.'s marine, to Lavinia, daughter of Capt. John Poulson.

5. At St. John's Cathedral, H. Gribble, Esq., chief officer of the H.C.'s ship Princess Charlotte of Wales, to Maris, daughter of the late R. Marshall, Esq., of Calnafercy, county of Kerry, Ireland. land.

7. Mr. John Ravenscroft, H.C.'s marine, to Miss J. M'G. Kyte. 17. Mr. Thos. Jones, to Miss M. A. Swaine. 20. J. N. Rind, Eq., surgeon, to Mrs. M. A.

20. J. N. Rhd, Esq., surgeon, to Mrs. M. A. Rose.
22. At St. Nazareth's Church, Mr. S. E. Avdell, to Mary, eldest deughter of the late Malcolm Manuk, Esq. Mabert, to Miss M. Noble.
24. Mr. G. Cattell, to Miss S. E. Halford.
26. At St. John's Catheria, John Brightman, Esq., to Harriet Emily, second daughter of the late Major John Gerrard, Bengal N.I.
Lutely. At the Lower Orphan School, Calcutta, Mr. C. Camplicer, of Chuprah, to Miss A. Thomass.

Thomas.

Sept. 18. At Lahore, the Rev. Baithaser Gasper, after a few hours' illness of cholera morbus, aged 52.

Oct. 20. At Mynpoory, in Zillah Etawah, of cholera, Mr. A. Peter (an assistant in the collector's office), aged about 34.

29. At Suebpore, Auston Noeme, third son of Mr. John (thew, aged 14.

Nov. I. At Paulgautcherry, Capt. T. Crichton, 38th NI., of cholera, aged 41.

5. At Asserghur, Licut. Mark Giberne, 23d NI. II. Mary, wife of Mr. T. Martyr, aged 23.

13. At Jubbulpore, Ens. W. Dunlop, 5th Extra NI., aged 24.

N.1., aged 21. At Berhampore, Mr. James Ford, an old and h respected officer in the country service, much aged 40.

aged 40.

14. Mary, widow of the late Mr. Peter Smithurst, 11.C's Bengal marine.

16. At Secmarce, in Meywar, after a few days' illness, of fever, Capt. T. M. Black, 88th N.I.

— At Futtyphur, Mrs. M. Rennell, widow of the late Wm. Rennell, Esq., Bengal civil service.

17. At Ramtree, in the Arakan province, Capt.
R. H. Phillipps, 48th N.I., assistant to the commissioners of Arakan.

— At Jubblepoor, Ens. J. R. Piercy, 5th Extra
N.I., aged 18.

20. At Bancoorah, of fever, Capt. Stephen Mer-er, 36th N.I.
— In Wood Steet, Chowringhee, Mrs. Ella. Wood, aged 39.
— Sarah Dorothea, wife of Mr. J. Williams, aged. 21. At Dacca, the lady of Francis Law, Esq., 21. At Dacca, the lady of Francis Law, Esq.,

aged 32.

22. At Rampore, Bauleah, Anne Matilda, wife of Mr. A. D'Semos, of the judge's office, at that station.

At Muttra, Lieut. James Mansfield, 1st Bengal N.I.
At Muttra, Lieut. James Mansfield, 1st Bengal N.I.
At Mitzapore, Lieut. Col. Archibald Macdonald, K.H., adjutant general of H.M.'s forces in India, aged 45.

26. At Baltool, Lieut. C. Braken, 45th Bengal

26. At Beitool, Lieut. to Busson.
NJ., of a billious fever.
28. Mrs. Martha Humble, aged 45.
— At Chittagong, Mrs. Brown.
29. Mr. Wim. Clarke, engineer of the steamer Irrawacddy, aged 35.
— Serj. B. Davidson, master of the band of 29. Mr. Wm. Clärke, engineer of the steamer Irranaeddy, aged 35.

— Serj. B. Davidson, master of the band of H.M.'s 14th regt.

Dec. I. At Dhooreghat Factory, in the Chucklee of Asimghur, Madelina Elizabeth Maria Frances, wife of Thos. Whatton, Esq., formerly of II.M.'s 8th Hussars, aged 36.

— Charles, son of Thos. Williamon, Esq., of Malacza, of spleen, aged 10 years.

3. Of pulmonary consumpton, Hugh, third son of R. B. Lloyd, Esq., aged 21.

— At Buxar, Mrs. Ann Davie, aged 32.

— At Suxar, Mrs. Ann Davie, aged 32.

3. At Sawah, near Neemuch, Lieut. G. N. Irvinche, and second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in command of the 4th Local H.O. and Second in comm

— Thos. D'Souza, Esq., aged 64.

— Mrs. Ann Hearnes.

11. Mary Anne, wife of Mr. Emmer, and only daughter of the late John Bentley, Esq., aged 27.

16. At Bhagalpore, aged about 30, the Rev. Thos. Christian, especially appointed by the late Bishop Heber to a mission among the mountaineers of Raimahl.

19. Eliza, the lady of Jas. Tosh, Esq., aged 21.

— Chas. Coqueraf, Esq., aged 45.

20. Anna, wife of Mr. Wim. Hogan, of the Commander-in-chief's office.

21. George Paxton, Esq., M.D., assistant surgeon, 41st N.I., aged 28.

— Sophia, daughter of Mr. Francis Derozlo, aged 17.

aged 17. 22. Mr. Wm. Polhil, aged 23.

22. Mr. Wm. Polhil, aged 23.

Mrs. May Cropley, aged 45.

Mr. John Watkins, aged 53.

Mr. John Watkins, aged 53.

Mr. A. D'Silva, relict of the late John D'Silva, undertaker.

St. Mr. L. Roberro, of the India Gazette press.

Mr. William Dorin, Esq., of the H.C.'s civil services.

Lately. At Saharunpore, J. T. Reade, Esq., of the civil service, collector of that district, in his Buth year.

— On board H.M.'s ship Hond, Assist. Surg. Robert Morrice, M.D., of that ship.

Madras.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

COMMAND ALLOWANCES.

Fort St. George, Oct. 5, 1827. -Hon, the Governor in Council has been pleased to resolve, under date the 6th of April last, that officers commanding mounted corps, shall retain their command allowances while employed on remount committees, and that the officers holding the temporary command of that corps shall not be entitled to the allowances for that period.

ADDITIONAL SUPERINTENDING SURGEONS.

Fort St. George, Oct. 5, 1827. - The Hon, the Governor in Council has resolved to abolish the appointments of staff surgeons at Cannanore, at Quilon, and in the Doosb, and in lieu thereof, and subject to the sanction of the Hon. the Court of Directors, to add two superintending surgeons to the establishment, one to be stationed in Malabar, Canara, and Travancore, and the other with the force in the Dooab, and to appoint cantonment surgeons respectively at Quilon and in the Dooab.

NEW GOVERNOR.

Proclamation. - Fort St. George, Oct. 18, 1827 .- Whereas the Right Hon. Stephen Rumbold Lushington hath been appointed by the Hon. the Court of Directors to be Governor of Fort St. George and its dependencies; it is therefore hereby proclaimed, that the Right Hon. Stephen Rumbold Lushington has, on the day of the date hereof, received charge of the said office of governor, and taken the oaths and his seat accordingly; and all persons are hereby required to obey the said Right Hon. Stephen Rumbold Lushing. ton, as governor and president in council. accordingly.

By order of the Right Hon, the Governor in Council.

D. HILL, Chief Sec.

SUSPENSION OF LIEUT, GREEN,

Fort St. George, Nov. 20, 1827 .- His Exc. the Commander-in-chief having brought to the notice of the government the disgraceful conduct of Lieut. J. G. Green, of the 1st regt. of Light Cavalry, on the passage from Madras to Bombay on the brig Britannia, the Right Hon. the Governor in Council has resolved that Lieut. Green shall be suspended from the Hon. Company's service until the decision of the Hon, the Court of Directors on the case shall be known, and that officer is hereby suspended accordingly.

DRESS OF OFFICERS.

Head Quarters, Nov. 20, 1827 .- The Commander-in-chief has recently noticed, with great dissatisfaction, the unmilitary style of dress in which some officers have indulged, notwithstanding his Exc.'s prohibition (G. O. 12th Dec. 1826) of "fanciful deviations" from the rules and orders laid down for the costume of the army in G. O. of the 8th Dec. 1823.

White jackets and white cravats are forbidden to be worn by an officer at any time out of quarters, and he is strictly prohibited from appearing publicly in any other dress than is authorized by the regulations of the service. Silk or crape jackets or trowsers are also prohibited; broad-cloth being the established material of which officers' clothing is to be made, all deviations from established regulation, whether in quality or fashion, are prohibited. The dress of every officer in the army, whether staff or regimental, has been fixed in General Orders, and what he is to wear on all occasions ia defined: officers are therefore required to conform to the particulars of the costume, as described for each occasion. Should officers disregard these orders, and appear again in white cotton jackets, or fancy clothing of any kind, the Commander-in-chief will prolibit the shell jacket and forage cap being worn, and order them to appear at all times in the uniform established for the parade.

All applications for submission to the Commander-in-chief are to be forwarded through the prescribed channel of communication, and officers are prohibited from addressing head-quarters direct.

In all letters, the subject of which is connected in any way with the public service, passing between military officers, the rank with the regimental or official designation of the person writing the letter must be attached.

ALLOWANCES TO SURGEONS.

Fort St. George, Nov. 23, 1827.—With reference to the regulations contained in General Orders under date the 6th of July last, the Right Hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that the following resolution be published.

Resolved, that surgeons of H.M.'s regiments of dragoons, and of the European horse artillery, be granted a per diem allowance at the rate of eighteen annas per mensem for every European present with the corps, in consideration of which they will afford medical aid to the followers in the same manner as is directed in regard to regiments of light cavalry.

DESIGNATION OF "INDO-BRITON."

Fort St. George, Nov. 30, 1827.— It having been represented to the Governor in Council that the class of persons designated Country Born in the General Order of the 13th of March last, prefer the designation of Indo-Briton, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that they shall in future be distinguished by that term in all public documents in which there may be occasion to mention them.

SUPFRINTENDENT GENERAL OF VACCINATION.

Fort St. George, Dec. 27, 1827.—The Right Hon, the Governor in Council has been pleased to determine that the appointment of superintendent general of vaccination shall be abolished, and that the superintendence of the department of vaccination shall hereafter be conducted by the superintending medical officers, under the general control of the Medical Board.

To provide for the local duties in that department which have hitherto been conducted by the superintendent general, the Right Hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to appoint Surg. Henry Atkinson to be superintendent of vaccination at the presidency.

DUTY OF VETERINARY SURGEONS.

Head-Quarters, Dec. 8, 1827. — Veterinary surgeons posted to brigades of horse artillery and regiments of light cavalry are, as a general rule, in addition to such charge, to attend the horses of all mounted the bary serving at the same station, which have not veterinary surgeons attached.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Nov. 9. A. Mellor, Esq., assistant to principal collector and magistrate of Madura.

W. U. Arbuthnot, Esq., assistant to principal collector and magistrate of southern division of Arcot.

30. T. A. Oakes, Esq., additional government commissioner for claims withdrawn from Carnatic Fund.

Dec. 4. A. Mellor, Esq., assistant to principal collector and magistrate of northern division of Arcot.

George Lys, Esq., sheriff of Madras.

J. Nixon, Esq., coroner of Madras.

Henry Taylor, Esq., commercial resident at Vizagapatam.

7. J. S. Lushington, Esq., private secretary to Right Hou, the Governor.

F. M. Lewin, Esq., assistant judge and joint crimmal judge of Salem.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS, PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort St. George, Oct. 5, 1827.—43d N. I. Lieut. J. U. Colebrooke to be adj., v, Coxe prom.

Assist, Surg. W. Browne to be garrison assist, surg. of Fort St. George, v. Fleming.
Assist, Surg. J. Daliuahov to have temporary charge of dispensary and of body guard.

charge of dispensary and of body guard.

Mr. H. G. Graham admitted on estali. as all assists surg., and app. to do duty under garrison surg. of Fort St. George.

Cadets Thus. Mears, Edw. Martin, C. R. Freese, J. A. Crawford, and Wm. Pollok, admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.

Mr. Surg. Wm. Scot and Mr. K. Macauly to be superintending surgs., to complete estab.

Mr. Superintending Surg. Dyer posted to Malabar, Canara, and Travancore.

Mr. Superintending Surg. Scot posted to presidency division.

Mr. Superintending Surg. Macauly posted to

Oct. 18.—Lieut. Col. H. G. A. Taylor, 18th N.I., to be town major of Fort St. George.

Maj. Douglas, royal artillery, to be military secretary, and to act as private secretary to Right Hon, the Governor until further orders.

Capt. Hay, H.M.'s 73d regt., and Lleut. J. S. Lushington, 6th regt. L.C., to be aides-de-camp to Right Hon. the Governor.

Capt. T. Watson, 4th N.I., and Cornet C. B. Lindsay, 3d L.C., to be extra aides-de camp to Right Hon. the Governor.

Lieut. Col. J. Carfrae, 36th N.I., to be honorary aide-de-camp to Right 11on. the Governor.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 16, 1827. — Ens. G. W. Sharp, removed from doing duty with 33d, to do duty with 9th N.I.

Oct. 17—Removals of Surgeons. W. S. Anderson, from 2d Europ. regt. to 33d N.I.; D. Donaldson, from 6th L.C. to 2d Europ. regt.; R. Anderson, from 50th N.I. to 5th L.C.; W. Haines, from 33d N.I. to 3th N.I.

lat-Lieut. G. Balfour, of artillery, removed from 3d to 4th bat.

Ens. E. Goodsnough, removed from doing duty with 43, to do duty with 4th N.I.

Oct. 22.—Capt. G. Leggatt, 41st N.I., to have charge of sick and details at Wallajahbad, belonging to corps on foreign service.

Oct. 24.—Cornets (recently prom.) posted to Regts. Rich. Prescott, to 8th L.C.; E. J. Stephenson, to 7th do.

7th do.

Ensigns (recenty prom.) posted to Regts. Josiah Smith, to 13th N.I.; Benj. Bale, 12th do.; Wm. Ritchle, 44th do.; Jas. Forsyth, 6th do.; Wm. Ritchle, 44th do.; Jas. Forsyth, 6th do.; M. Ricolay, ist Europ. regt.; R. V. Wellesford, 39th N.I.; Thos. Lowe, ist do.; W. Pollok, 36th do.; H. A. Trembelt, 17th do.; J. C. Turmbull, 5ls. do.; Thos. Blackburne, 27th do.; W. B. Littlehales, 52th do.; R. Younghusband, 19th do.; I. Maughan, 49th do.; W. Thore, 3d do.; A. E. Moore, 8th do.; J. R. Starke, 20th do.; J. B. Layard (not arrived), 22d do.; E. Slack, 13th do. Co. 25.—Cornet E. J. Stephenson, removed. 4th

Oct. 25.—Cornet E. J. Stephenson, removed, at his own request, from 7th to 6th L.C.

Oct. 26.—Lleut. A. Shirrefs, 21st N.L., struck off strength of rifle corps, and app. to 1st bat. pio-neers, v. Sherman employed on other duty.

Lieut. G. Rowlandson, of artillery, removed from 3d to 2d bat.

Ens. E. G. Cotton, posted to 11th N.I., to com-

Oct. 27.—Ens. G. W. Sharp, posted to 3d or Palamcottah L.I., to complete estab.

Oct. 31.—Cornet R. H. Lushington (recently arrived) app. to do duty with Governor's body guard.

Ens. J. Christie and T. Peacock (recently arrived) app. to do duty with 18th N.I.

Veterinary Surg. J. C. Ralston directed to proceed to Arcot and do duty under superintendent of veterinary establishment.

Nov. 7.—Ens. J. H. Stapleton, posted to 39th N.I., to complete estab.

Nov. 8.—Lieut. Col. G. Jackson, removed from 50th to 25th N.I., and Lieut. Col. C. Elphinstone from 25th to 50th N.I.

Nov. 9. Lieut. G. Alcock, of artil., removed from 1st to 4th bat.

Nor. 11.—Cornet C. B. Lindsay, 3d L.C. (extra alde-de-camp to Right Hon. the Governor) app. also to do duty with body guard, from 18th Oct. 1827 2d-Lieut. S. W. Croft, of artillery, removed from 2d to 4th bat.

Nov. 13.-Assist. Surg. J. Caswell removed from 51st to 6th N.I., and Assist. Surg. P. Poule posted to 51st N.I.

Nov. 19.—Ens. John Sibbald posted to 34th or Chicacole L. Inf., to complete estab.

Nov. 21.—Remorals of Leut. Cols. J. Woulfe, from 3d or P. L. I. to 20th N. I.; W. C. Oliver, from 4th to 27th N. I.; C. Brook, from 26th N. I. to 3d or P. L. I.; T. King, from 27th to 14th N. I. Ens. W. M. Gunthorpe, 6th N.I., posted to rifle corns. Ens. C.F. Compton, posted to 48th N.I. to complete estab. Nov. 23. — Assist. Surg. J. Lawrence removed from 8th to 41st N.I.

Non. 24.—Removals and postings of Surgeons.— D. Donaldson, from 2d Europ. regt. to 11th N.I.; J. Cruickshank, from 3th N.I. to 8th L.C.; W. Turnbull, from 11th N.I. to 2d Europ. regt.; W. H. Richards, from 8th L.C. to 8th N.I.

Assist. Surg. G. Thompson posted to 11th regt.

Nov. 28 .- Capt. F. Fosberry posted to 1st Nat. Vet. Bat.

Ens. J. Seager posted to 8th N.I. to complete

Fort St. George, Nov. 6.—Assist. Surg. W. Mortimer to be permanent assistant and hospital store-keeper in garrison hospital of Fort St. George, v.

Assist, Surg. E. Chapman app. to medical charge of zillah of Calicut, v. Mortimer.

Nov. 9.—Lieut. J. Horne, of artillery, to be staff officer to detachment of artillery at Prince of Wales' Island, v. Carew returned to Europe.

1st Brig. Horse Artil. Ligut. 6. Pinchard to be adj., v. M'Nair; Lieut. J. C. M'Nair to be qu. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Pinchard. 39th N.I. Sen. Lieut. J. Hole to be capt., and and Sen. Ens. H. Harriott to be lieut., v. Crichton dec; date 2d Nov. 1827.

Mr. Jas. Wilkinson admitted on estab. as an assist surg., and app. to do duty under garrison surg. of Fort St. George.

Nov. 13.—Capt. W. Murray, 46th N.I., to command 1st bat, pioneers., v. Crichton dec.

Capt. J. H. Bonnette, 19th N.I., to be dep. assist, qu. mast. gen. in northern div., v. Murray.

Nov. 16.—Capt. J. J. Underwood, of engineers, directed to resume situation of superintending engineer in southern division of army, and Lieut. F. C. Cotton app. to temporary charge of engineer department in Dooab.

department in Doods.

Lieut. T. W. T. Prescott, 1st L.C., and Lieut.

G. Affleck, 34th N.I., having returned to Europe without permission from government, struck off from strength of army from 24th Oct. respec-

Lieut. M. J. Rowlandson, 32d N.I., to act as secretary to college board during absence of Mr. Morris.

Nov. 20.—Maj. R. S. Douglas, royal artillery, to e aide-de-camp to Right Hon. the Governor, v. Hay dec.

lst L.C. Sen. Cornet J. C. N. Favell to be lieut., v. Prescott struck off; date 25th Oct. 1827.

34th L.I. Sen. Ens. G. Broadfoot to be lieut., v. Affleck struck off; date 25th Oct. 1827.

Nov. 23.—Capt G. Faris, 1st L.C., to command escort of resident in Travancore.

Capt. F. Fosberry, 8th N.I., transferred to invalid estab. at his request.

Lieut. Col. T. Stewart, 11th N.I., to command troops in Ceded Districts during absence of Col.

Nov. 27.—Surg. D. Donaldson to be garrison surg. of Bellary, v. Burton permitted to return to Europe.

48th N.I. Sen. Ens. Colin M'Kenzie to be lieut., v. Mellish discharged; date 10th Nov. 1827. Non. 30.—Assist. Surg. W. K. Hay, attached to principal collector and political agent in Southern Mahratta country.

8th N.I. Sen. Lieut. P. S. Hele to be capt., and Sen. Ens. John Curre to be lieut., v. Fosberry in-valided; date 24th Nov. 1827. Dec. 4.—2d L.C. Sen. Cornet W. R. Strange to be lieut., v. Flayer dec.; date 24th Nov. 1827.

Cadet G. S. Cotter admitted to artillery, and prom. to 2d-lieut.—Cadets W. G. Beagin, Wm. Junor, and Jas. Campbell, admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns .- Mr. Jas. Western admitted a veterinary surg.

Dec. 7.—2d L.C. Lieut. H. Briggs to be adj., v. Flayer dec.

Infantry. Sen. Lieut. Col. R. H. Yates to be lieut. col. com., v. Newal dec.; Sen. Maj. N. H. Hatherley, from 14th N.I., to be lieut. col. in suc. to Yates prom.

14th N.I. Sen. Capt. P. Barclay to be maj., Sen. Lieut. (Brev. Capt.) V. Mathias to be capt., and Sen. Ens. W. E. Gibb to be lieut., in suc. to Hatherly prom.

Head-Quarters, Dec. 4.—Capt. G. Maxwell re-moved from 1st to 4th Nat. Vet. Bat.

Dec. 5.—Ens. H. T. Hillyard posted to 14th N.I. to complete estab.

Lleut. Col. Com. R. H. Vates (late prom.) posted to 49th N.I.—Lleut. Col.W. C. Oliver removed from 27th to 14th N.I.—Lleut. Col. N. H. Hatherly (late prom.) posted to 27th N.I.

Dec. 8.—Capt. J. Alldritt removed from 1st to 3d bat. artillery.—2d-Lieut. G. S. Cotter posted to 3d bat. ditto.

Ensigns W. G. Beagin, W. Junor, and J. Campbell (recently arrived), app., the two former to do duty with 16th, and the latter with the 42d N.I.

Veterinary Surg. J. Western posted to 5th L.C. Veterinary Surg. J. C. Raiston, posted to 1st brig. horse artillery. Dec. 11.—Lieut. Col. T. King removed from 14th to 4th N.I.

Dec. 12.

Dec. 12.—Capt. F. H. M. Wheeler removed from 1st to 2d bat ploneers, and Capt. H. T. Van Heythusen from 2d to 1st bat, ploneers.

Heytnusen from 22 to 1st part pioneers.
Lieut J. Horne removed from 4th bat, to 1st brigade horse artill, and Lieut H. Watkins from 1st brig. to 4th bat, artillery.

Assist. Surg. J. M'Farland removed from 7th L.C. to 2d bat. artil.

Assist. Surg. D. M'Dougall removed from 21st N.I. to D troop of 1st brig. horse artil.

Dec. 15.—Assist. Surg. S. Chippendall posted to 33d N.I.

Fort St. George, Dec. 11. — 16th N.I. Ens. R. Affick to be lieut., and to be borne as a supernumerary until vacancy shall occur in regt.

Messrs. F. Cooper and T. L. Matthews admitted on estab. as assist. surgs.

14th N.I. Lieut. C. W. Young to be adj., v.

Mathias prom.

Cadet T. L. Patch admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign.

Maj. Wm. Kelso, 26th N.I., to be commanding officer on Neligherry Hills. Capt. P. S. Hele, 8th N.I., transferred to invalid estab. at his own request.

Lieut. H. Watkins, of artil., to be staff officer to detachment of artil. at Prince of Wales' Island, v. Horne attached to horse brigde.

Surg W. S. Anderson to be staff surgeon to troops on coast of Tennasserim, v. Campbell permitted to return to Europe.

Doc. 18.—10th N.I. Lieut. W. Cotton to be adj., v. Kenny; Lieut. II. E. Kenny to be qu. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Cotton.

Asist. Surgs. F. Cooper and T. L. Matthews app. to do duty under gar surg. of Fort St. George. —Asist. Surgs. R. Cole and H. G. Graham app. to do duty under cantonment surg. at St. Thomas's Mount.

Dec. 21.—Maj. Gen. Jas. Leith, of infantry, permitted to resign command of southern division of army, from 1st Jan. next, in compliance with his request, and to return to Europe on furlough.

Lieut. F. Smith, 25th N.I., permitted to resign Hon. Company's service, in compliance with his Officers returned to duty, from Europe.—Capt R. Backhouse, 8th N.I.; arrived 30th Sept. 1827.—Lieut. M. J. Rowlandson, 324 N.I.; arrived ditto.—Lieut. Col. C. Elphinstone, 25th N.I.; arrived 30th Oct.—Maj. A. Maclaren, 51st N.I.; arrived ditto.—Capt. G. Faris, 1st L.C.; arrived ditto.—Lieut. G. Alcock, artili, arrived 5th Oct.—Capt. F. W. Morgan, 1st N.I.; arrived 3th Oct.—Lieut. J. A. Smith, 26th N.I.; arrived 30th Oct.—Capt. John Aldritt, artillery; arrived 30th No.—Lieut. Jas. Nievenson, 12th N.I.; arrived ditto.—Lieut. Jas. Nievenson, 12th N.I.; arrived ditto.—Lieut. W. Nicolson, 49th N.I.; arrived ditto.

FURLOUGHS.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Oct. 5. Surg. J. Macleod.—Lieut. Col. Com. R. Podmore, 44th N.I. (via Bombay).
—Lieut. Col. G. Jackson, 54th N.I. (via Bombay).
W. Godley, 45th N.I. (ditto).—Maj. J. Ship.
W. Godley, 45th N.I. (ditto).—Maj. J. Ship.
Is N.I., for health.—Gyl. J. S. Wylle, 29th N.I., for health.—Nov. 6. (apt. J. S. Wylle, 29th N.I., 61th Lieut. H. N. Noble, 40th N.I.—Surg. W. H. Richards, for Mobile, 40th N.I.—Surg. W. H. Richards, for Health.—Bombay.—20. Lieut.
J. N. Greaves, 12th N.I.—Lieut. E. Horne, 30th N.I., for health.—Eas. H. G. Williams, 30th N.I., for health.—Surg. J. Burton.—Ens. W. B. Lieut. J. N. Greaves, 12th N.I., for health.—30. Capt. F. Foberry, invalid estab, for health.—30. Capt. F. Foberry, invalid estab, for health.—13. Capt. F. Foberry, invalid estab, for health.—15. Precott, 5th N.I., for health.—Lieut. W. Fyfe, 52th N.I.—Assis. Surg. A. Turmbull, for health (permitted to proceed from Bombay).—14. Maj. J. Moncrief, 20th N.I., Surg. J. Campbell, for health.—East. J. Macdougail, 17th N.I., for health.—12. Capt. R. G. Polwhele, of artil.—Lieut. G. Arbuthnot, 3d Ltd., for easth.

To Calcutta.—Nov. 13. Lieut. G. H. Best, horse still. Soc Starsentil.

 $T_0$  Calcutta.—Nov. 13. Lieut. G. H. Best, horse artil., for five months.

To Bombay,—Nov. 27. Lieut. Col. John Carfrae: 86th N.I. (eventually to embark for Europe). To Sea.—Dec. 14. Assist. Surg. John Brown, for four months, for health.

Cancelled.-Lieut, J. Lewis, 24th N.I., to Cape of Good Hope, &c.

MISCELLANEOUS. STORM.

Within the last thirty-six hours Madras has been visited by one of the severest storms we recollect to have witnessed for a long time, It was not of such lengthened duration as the great hurricane of 1820, nor was the wind of such overpowering violence as in the memorable storm of 1818; but the strife of the elements was sufficiently awful and destructive to appal the stoutest heart. The gale commenced early on Wednesday morning, and the wind came in violent blasts from the northwest quarter; the surf rose with great rapidity, and soon after noon broke with such violence, and so far out, as to prevent all communication with the shipping in the Roads, although the several commanders made every exertion to get on board their vessels before the threatened storm should come on with all its expected fury. Notwithstanding the heavy swell in the Roads, the ships, of which the following are the names, appeared to ride easy .-The Mathean, Capt. D. Oliver; Security, Capt. A, Ross; Felicitas, Capt. P. Campbell; Hope, Capt. T. Hill; Gunjava, Capt. J. Taylor; David Matcolm, Capt. W. D. Messiter; Waterloo, Capt. J. Williams.

The wind moderated towards sun-set, but continued to blow in strong gusts from N. N. W. till near midnight, when it increased to a regular hurricane, the rain pouring in torrents. Doors and bolts, in exposed situations, were now of little avail, and most of the mansions on Choultry Plain received much damage. The storm raged without mitigation till day-light, the wind running the usual course of these visitations, gradually going round the compass from north to east and to south. As day broke, attention was anxiously directed to the shipping, as it was feared that, if they had parted in the night, they must have come on shore. All the ships had disappeared, and hopes were entertained, for a brief space, that all had succeeded in getting to sea; but alas! it was quickly ascertained that three vessels were wrecked at St. Thomé. As far as we have been able to collect, the Hope parted from her anchors about one o'clock A. M., when the hurricane was at its height, and blowing dead in shore so that it was utterly impossible, by any skill or exertion, to save her. Such was the force of the wind and sea that she was driven high and dry on the beach, where she must soon go to pieces. It was an affecting sight to be fold the downcast look of our unfortunate countrymen, as the viewed the wreck of the favourite ship. One of the crew had saved a dog, another a beautiful English cat, which each carried in his arms with characteristic fondness; but nothing else, we believe, was saved by either officers or crew.

Since writing the above, we have obtained some additional particulars of the effects of the storm. The Security and the Felicitas are both on shore, total wrecks.* The Waterloo, we hear, has floated into Adyar River. We have just heard that some other ship, supposed to be the Gunjava, is on shore to the southward-she is a vessel that had arrack on board, to which the boatmen paid their respects, and got, as might be expected, intoxicated. man, in attempting to swim on shore from the Hope, was drowned. Another ship is reported to be on shore to the northward. The scene presented in the various compounds, gardens, and on the public roads, is indescribable. Wreck and ruin stared the passengers in the face at every turn. and the number of trees torn up by the roots, walls thrown down, and houses unroofed, is incalculable. A great many cattle perished—we fear, too, that many natives were drowned, or killed in the general ruin. The injury done to the flower and vegetable gardens will not be repaired for many months. The sea made no impression whatever upon De Havilland's bulwark, although the Beach Road was rendered impassable by being covered with stones of enormous size and weight, proving the violence with which the sea beat against it. It is not saying too much of this stupendous work, that it preserved Bentinck's buildings from destruction. Many of the Massoolah boats were carried far into Black Town, and not a few were broken all to pieces. All the windows of the light-house were smashed to atoms by the force of the wind -Mad. Cour. Dec. 7.

The weather has become settled and fine, and we hope it will continue so, for for we have had enough of the monsoon for one season.

We gave a hurried account of the hurricane in Friday's paper, and we are happy to find that although our information was necessarily picked up amidst great agitation and confusion there was no material error in our account. There are a few additional particulars respecting the loss of the ship Hope which ought to be mentioned; and amongst the first the unbounded kindness and attention of our respected governor towards the unfortunate crew. He was at the wreck by seven o'clock on Thursday morning, before the storm had entirely subsided, and his presence was no doubt the means of preserving many valuable lives; for we are grieved to say that the natives who had flocked down to the beach, so far from assisting our unfortunate countrymen in getting through the violent surf, in many instances seized them, exhausted as they were, and held them under water, till they had plundered them of the few valuables which they had saved from the general wreck! Several of the sailors had secured their all, a few dollars, tied round their necks, and these were forcibly taken from them, till upon the arrival of the right hon, the governor, with his body guard and the acting superintendant of police, a stop was put to this proceeding. These disgraceful circumstances we are assured can be verified by affidavit; and we would not give publicity to them upon slight grounds. The right hon, the governor remained on the beach the greater part of the day, aiding by his exertions and liberal offers of rewards the escape of the crews of the different vessels. He sent the whole of the officers and Enropean crews to the Government House, where they were most liberally entertained. whilst he himself remained with his guard to prevent plunder. Mr. Elliot, too, was exceedingly active and effective in his exertions; he went of himself on a catamaran through the surf to the Security, and carried out a rope by which many lives were saved. A subscription has been set on foot for the unfortunate sufferers, who have lost every thing they possessed, and it is headed by Mr. Lushington, who put down his name for 500 rupees. We understand that the steward of the ship Hope had saved seventy pounds, the profits of the voyage with which he intended to have engaged in some little traffic on the return voyage, but the whole was lost in the general wreck. We believe nothing certain has been yet heard of the Malabar or Gunjava, but the general apprehensions on their account have not subsided. The keels of two large English ships, one country built and the other English, were washed on shore near the custom-house on Saturday, and two capstans have been washed on shore at Covelong. The brig Active, which was blown out of the roads on the 14th ultimo, has been wrecked to the north-ward. The Circassian, which also parted in the same gale, has been towed into Trincomalee, dismasted. We fear we have yet to learn of other disasters .- [Ibid, Dec. 11.

• "We understand strong suspicions are entertained that the Second Officer of the Federatas, who was stated to have failen overboard during the gale, did not come fairly by his untimely end. The Commander of the vessel was left behind when the vessel went to sea, and we hear that the Deputy Master Attendant has instituted an inquiry into some suspicious circumstances. It appears that the unfortunate officer was the only European on board the Ship."—Mad. Cour., Dec. 3.

We are happy to observe, that the ship Malabar has reached Trincomalee harbour in safety from Devicotta; and that another ship dismasted was observed to pass the port port about the time of the Malabar's getting in." We sincerely trust that this vessel may prove to be the Gunjava .- Mad. Gov. Gaz. Jan. 3.

ENTERTAINMENT BY THE GOVERNOR.

On Tuesday evening a splendid entertainment was given by the right hon, the Governor at the banqueting room, the front of which was brilliantly illuminated with coloured famps. The company began to assemble at an early hour, and the quadrilles commenced about ten o'clock, and was kept up with considerable spirit until a late hour; and shortly after the departure of the Naib-i-Mookhtar (who was present during the evening), supper was announced, which consisted of every delicacy of the season. Among the company we had the pleasure to observe his excellency the Commander-in-chief and his fair lady, and the hon. Mr. and Mrs. Græme: the party did not break up till a late hour. Mad. Gov. Gaz. Jan. 3.

ASSEMBLY.

The public assembly on Monday evening was well attended; the right hon, the Governor, his excellency the Commanderin chief, and Lady Walker honoured the rooms with their presence. Dancing was as usual, kept up with much glee, and the stewards were entitled to great praise for the arrangements of the evening, which were excellent, and their attention to the party .- Ibid, Dec. 6.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals.

Nov. 9. Circassian, Douthwaite, from London.
—23. Macauley, Alken, from Calcutta.—30. Hope, Hill, from London and Cape of Good Hope.—Der.
9. Royal Charlotte, Dudman, from London.—10.
1. Giroule, Caussade, from Bordeaux.—16. II.
M. S. Surceas, Sterling, from Penang.—17. II.M.S.
Champion, Stoddart, from ettle, and Predector, Waugh, from Calcutta.—19. Frequesson, Girocs, from Calcutta.—19. Prefuence, from Icle of France.—25. H. M. S. Fly, Pennell, from Penang.—31. Prime, Regent, Murphy, from London.
—Jan. 8. Weilington, Evans, from London.

Departures.

Nov. 8. Warren Hastings, Mason, and Elphin-stone, Atkinson, both for Calcutta.—13. Circassian, stone, Atkinson, both for Calcutta.—13. Circossian, Douthwaite, For Calcutta.—Dec. 19. David Clarke, Viles, for Eskapilly and Calcutta.—24. Fergusson, Groves, for London.—26. H.M.S. Champion, Stoddart on a cruize.—27. Royal Charlotte, Dudman, for Penang. —Jan. 6. ILM's ships Fly, Pennell, and Success, Sterling, on a cruize.—9. Carnebro Castle. Davay & Extender. brea Castle, Davey, for London.

BIRTHS.

Aug. 19. At Tavoy, the lady of Lieut. P. J. Begble, Madras Artillery, of a daughter. 21. At Tavoy, the lady of Lieut. W. B. Gilby, 32d N.I., of a daughter.
Oct. 3. At Nellore, the lady of E. Smalley, E80., of a daughter.

32d N.1., of a daughter.
Oct. 3. At Nellore, the lady of E. Smalley, Esq., of a daughter.
9. Mrs. Geo. Taylor, of a son.
10. At Bangalore, the lady of the Rev. W.
Campbell, of a daughter.
— At Jaulnah, the lady of Geo. Sandys, Esq., 6th L.C., of a daughter.
12. At Bangalore the wife of Qu. Mast. Avery, 12 th ores briefled set the second

1st horse brigade artil. of a son.

14. At Belgaum, the lady of Capt. Cozens, 49th N.I., of a still-born child.

— At Bellary, the lady of J. Burton, Esq., gar. surg., of a daughter.

15. At Coleche, the lady of D. A. Brown, Esq.,

of a son.

of a son.

16. At St. Thomas's Mount, the lady of the Rev. Mr. Blenkinsop, military chaplam, of a son.

18. At Rutnagherry, the lady of D. Shaw, Esq.,

W. D. of departure. M.D., of a daughter. 25. At Royapooram, Mrs. Anne Jones, of a daughter.

26. Fanny, wife of Mr. W. Stuart, of a daughter.

27. The lady of W. S. Binny, Esq., of a son.

28. Mrs. Geo. Bachelor, of a son.

30. At Calicut, the lady of Cant. W. Taylor,

30th N.I., of a daughter.

31. At Darwar, the lady of Lieut. Sayer, 5th

N.I., of a still-born child.

Nov. 1. At Vizigapatam, the lady of Capt. R. L. Highmoor, deputy judge adv. gen., of a daugh ter.

2. Mrs. Moore, of a son.

— The lady of Capt. A. Inglis, of a daughter.

— At Masulipatam, the lady of Capt. J. W.
Cleveland, 30th N.I., of a son.

9. At Thome, Mrs. John Monisse, of a daughter
11. At Palaveram, the lady of Lieut. and Qu
Mazt. Marshall, 33d N.I., of a son.

A Marungahad, the lady of Lieut. Ager, 5ti
reg. Nizam's Infantry, of a son.

19. At Samuloutah, the lady of Lieut. F. Chal mers, 22d N.I., of a daughter, still-born.

The lady of John Bird, Esq., of a son.

2. The lady of John Bird, Esq., of a son.

2. At Pondicherry, Mrs. A. Williamson, of a daughter.

daughter. 24. At Pulicat, the lady of the Rev. J. Kind

24. At Pullcat, the lady of the Rev. J. Kind linger, of a son. 25. At Bangalore, the lady of Licut. R. Mitchell, 6th N.1., of a daughter. 26. At Ellichpoor, the lady of Capt. Hugh Robisson, paymaster, Nizam's service, of a daughter. Dec. 1. At Jaulnah, the lady of H. S. Foord Esg., Madras artillery, of a daughter. 11. At Bellary, the hady of Major Marrett, commanding lith N.1., of a daughter. 17. At Fort St. George, the lady of J. Hendeson, Esg., M.D., surgeon of H.M. 189th regt., o a son and heir.

21. At Dharwar, the lady of Capt. Welland 236.

21. At Dharwar, the lady of Capt. Welland 23d regt., of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Oct. 13. At Nelloor, Capt. D. Allen, command ing Nelloor, to Miss Louisa Smith. 17. At Vagagapatam, Mr. C. Barnett, assistan Surveyor, to Mary, youngest daughter of Mr. J

22. At Masulipatam, Mr. F. Laville, band mas-ter 38th N.I., to Miss M. C, Jefferson. 27. At Kamptee, near Nagboor, Lleut. Jas Dickson, 50th regt., to Miss Elizabeth S. Abra ham.

29. At the Black-town Capuchin Church, Mr. M.

22. At the Black-town taptenin Church, at 22. De Monte, to Miss L. Guy.
Nov. 2, At Bangalore, Dr. Ricks, 2d brigade of horse artillery, to Dorothea, youngest daughter of Major Yarde, Chudleigh, Devonshire, of this Major Yarde, establishment.

3. At Canannore, Assist. Apothecary Jas. Starenburgh, to Miss G. Kemp.
5. Mr. B. Johnson, to Miss M. Scott.

kenburgh,

13. At Vizagapatam, the Rev. James Gordon, missionary, to Mrs. Rebecca Vaughan, relict of the late Lieut. Col. Vaughan, of the invalid establish-

21. At Secunderabad, Mr. John Forbes, mer-

21. At Setunderabad, Mr. John Folks, Mc. chant, to Miss M. A. Francke.
— At Mangalore, Lieut. and Adj. H. W. Lardner, 50th N.I., to Miss Louisa Hart.
22. At Palameottah, Mr. W. B. Addis, of the London Missionary Society, to Miss Emily Van-

28. At Arcot, W. D. Davis, Esq., of the civil ervice, to Harriett Frances, youngest daughter service, to Harriett Frances, journages.

of George Lys, Faq.

— Mr. J. V. Pertleire, to Catherine, eldes daughter of Mr. F. Raymond, of Tranquebar.

30. Mr. P. Deceles, to Miss M. T. Janzen.

Doc. 5. At Bangalore, Capt. Biddle, of the artillery, to Miss Purton.

18. At Arnee, Lieut. J. A. Macdonald, 3d Madras L. C. to Sophia, third daughter of the late Thomas Cotton, Esq., of Chase Lodge, Enfield, Middlesen.

DEATHE

Sept. 21. At Madras, Mr. Donald Calder, late market serjeant, aged 41. Oct. 9. Mrs. Anne Taylor, wife of Mr. Geo.

Oct. 9. Mrs. Anne Taylor, wife of Mr. Geo. Taylor, aged 20.
10. At Palamcottah, Lleut. J. F.G. Macleane, 3d regt. P. L. 1.
11. Mr. J. A. Fitzsimons, aged 21.
13. At Pondicherry, Madame De Bausset, aged 67, relict of the late Chevalier Pierre de Bauset.
18. At Pondicherry, Lleut. Wm. Boyton, halfpay, II. Mr. 30th regt.
19. At Pondicherry, Lleut. Wm. Boyton, halfpay, II. Mr. 30th regt.
— In Black Town, Mrs. P. Lawrence, assistance of the Mrs. A. Corbett, merchant at Arcot, aged 97 years.
— At Palamcottah, Capt. J. Maxtone, 3d regt. L.I.

Nov. I. At Paulgautcherry, Capt. T. Crichton, 39th N.I., from cholers, aged 41.

4. At Karleal, Mrs. A. M. Lichtenstein, aged 52, widow of the late F. S. Lichtenstein, member of the royal government at Tranquebar.

7. At Bangaiore, Capt. John Croker, H.M. s

7. At Bangalore, Capt. John Croker, H.M.s 48th regt. 9. At Pondicherry, Elizabeth, relict of the late

9. At Pondicherry, Elizabeth, relict of the late Mr. Jos. Manulsse, aged 95.
11. Capt. A. A. Cortlandt, H.M.'s 45th regt., son of the late Col. Philip Yan Cortlandt. 18. After a short illness, at the Government House, Capt. P. Hay, H.M.'s 73d regt, ald-decamp to the Right Hon. the Governor. 90. At Secunderabad, Lleut. Nathan Ashhurst, — At Belgaum, Charlotte, wife of Mr. Conductor Hobart, of the Orduance department at that station.

tnat station.

— A Royapooram, Mr. Danlel Johnston (of the Government Bank), aged 49.

28. At Belgaum, of fever, Eliza Margaret, wife of Capt. John Waliece, 46th N.I.

Bec. 1. At Royapottah, Mrs. Emelia Quintual,
aged 28.

5. At Pondicherry, Mrs. Helena St. Pourçaint. 7. At Secunderabad, Assist. Surg. George Bush,

7. At Secunderabus, Assiss only, October 18, May 66th regt.
8. Daniel Neale, Exp., solicitor in the Supreme Court of Judiciature af Madras.
9. At Bellary, Emily, third daughter of Mr. J. Burton, garrison surgeon of that station, aged five parton, garrison surgeon of that station, aged nee years.

12. Mrs. Lucy Goostree, aged 45.

25. Jane, fourth daughter of Mr. James Donaldson, of West Cowes, 1sle of Wight, aged 18.

Lately. At Ellichpoor, Lieut. Charles Arrow, Brigade major of that division, Nizam's army.

Bomban.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

NEW GOVERNOR.

Bombay Castle, Nov. 1, 1827 .- The following proclamation by government in the general department of this date is published in General Orders for the information of the army.

Proclamation.

Whereas Major Gen. Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B., hath been appointed by the Hon. the Court of Directors to the office of Governor of Bombay and its dependencies, on the resignation of the same by the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone .- It is therefore hereby proclaimed, that the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone having this day resigned the said office, Major Gen. Sir John Malcolm has on the date hereof received charge of the government of Bombay and its dependencies, and taken the oaths and his seat under the usual salute from the garrison, and all persons are required to obey the said Major Gen. Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B., as Governor and president in council accordingly.

HON. MR. ELPHINSTONE.

Bombay Castle, Nov. 1. 1827, - The Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that the same military honours be paid to the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone during his residence at Bombay, as if he had continued in charge of the government up to the period of his embarkation.

SICE OFFICERS.

Bombay Castle, Dec. 13, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council has been pleased to sanction an arrangement for the accommodation of sick officers of his Majesty's and the Hon. Company's service arriving at the presidency from out stations, under such detailed regulations as may be established by his Excellency the Commander in Chief.

The officers of his Majesty's service are to be provided for, as far as possible, in the bungalows belonging to the depôt at Colaba, in addition to which four cadjan roofs to cover captains' tents are to be erected for the same purpose.

For the accommodation of the officers of the Hon. Company's service one temporary building (to be removed annually during the rains) is to be creeted on the esplanade,

Each quarter, both on Colaba and the esplanade, is to be provided at the government expense with a field bedstead, table, two chairs and a commode.

An establishment of poons, sweepers, &c. at an expense of rupees 50 per mensem is sanctioned, and will be distributed among the respective premises.

During the rains, the officer's quarters in the town barracks (if not occupied by troops) will be appropriated for the use of officers of both services exclusively.

Officers occupying sick quarters under this arrangement are to pay one-half of their regulated house rent.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Judicial Department.

Oct. 29. Mr. R. C. Chambers, junior assistant to judge and criminal judge in Northern Concan. Nov. 1. Mr. J. Kentish, judge and criminal judge of Surat.

Mr. E. Grant, judge and criminal judge of Ah-

Mr. J. Bell, judge and criminal judge of Kairah. Mr. H. H. Glass, register to Sudder Dewanec and Foundaree Adawlut.

Territorial Department.

Oct. 29. Mr. S. W. Kynaston, supernumerary as sistant to collector in Kandelsh.

Mr. A. W. Ravenscroft, assistant to principal collector of Dharwar.

Mr. P. Scott, supernumerary assistant to col-lector of Poonah.

Mr. W. G. Clark, third assistant to collector in Southern Concari.

Mr. J. Burnett, assistant to collector of customs of Bombay.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS. &c.

Bombay Castle, Sept. 6, 1827.—Messrs. A. C. Do-naidson, P. & N. Arniel, T. Edmurds, and John Jessop admitted to inf., and prom. to ensigns.— Mr. A. Bertram admitted an assist surg.

Sept. 8 .- 8th N.I. Lleut. H. Sandwith to be capt. Soft, 3.—3a. W. Lieut. A. Sandwin to be capt, and Ens. A. S. Hawkins to be lieut, in suc to Sharp discharged from service by general court-martial; dated 25th Aug. 1827.

2d Extra Bat. Lieut. T. Mitchell, 15th N.I., to be qu. mast. and interp. in Hindoostanee and Mahrata languages, v. Sandwith prom.; dated 6th Sept. 1827.

2d L.C. Lieut. J. Brooks to be capt., and Cornet H. L. Salmon to be lieut., in suc. to Rose dec.; dated 30th Aug. 1827.

Sept. 11.—Capt. J. Addison, 18th N.I., transferred, at his own request, to invalid estab.

Sept. 12.—18th N.I. Ens. A. Meadows to be lieut., v. Doherty dec.; dated 13th Sept. 1827.

Sept. 13.—Capt. W. Spratt, 4th N.I., to command, and Lieut. F. Fortune, of 20th N.I., to be adj. of Nat. Vet. Bat.

Capt. W. Stirling, 17th N.I., to command 2d Extra Bat., v. Spratt.

Capt. C. Crawley to be a brigade major to forces, v. Rose dec.

Oct. 20.—23d N.I. Ens. E. W. Cartwright to be lieut., v. Giberne dec.; dated 9th Oct. 1827.

Oct. 23.—24 Extra Bat. Lieut. J. E. G. Morris, 24th N.I., to be qu. mast. and litterp. in Hindoostanee language, v. Mitchell; dated 16th Oct. 1827.

tance language, v. Mitchell; dated 16th Oct. 1827. Temporary Appontment confirmed. Capt. 6, Moor, 18th N.I., to officiate as brig. maj. to Surat div. of army, until arrival of Capt. Newton.—Lieut. C. Johnston, 3d N.I., to act as interp. to Europ. regt., from 7th Oct.—Lieut. E. M. Ear'e, 24th regt., to act as interp. in Hindoostance and Mahratta languages to 15th N.I., from 26th Sept.—Lieut. G. Wilson, 26th regt., to be acting adj. of wing detached to Poona.—Lieut. H. N. Ramsay, acting qu. mast. 1st Extra bat., to perform dutes of interp. in Hindoostance language to 11th N.I. Cart 27.—10th N.I. Fus. S. A. Crofton to be

Oct. 27.-10th N.I. Ens. S. A. Crofton to be lieut., v. Reynton dec.; dated 15th Oct. 1827.

let or Gr. N.I. Ens. C. B. Rait to be lieut, v. Philips dec.; dated 20th June 1827.—Lieut. T. Chbborn to be capt, and Ens. B. H. Croket to be lieut, in suc. to Falconer dec.; dated 15th Oct.

14th N.I. Ens. J. M. Dickinson to be qu. mast.; dated 20th Oct. 1827.

Regt. Artillery. Lieut. G. Yeadell to be qu. mast. dated 26th Oct. 1827.

dated 26th Ot. 1827.
Oct. 31.—Cadet C. L. J. D. Pre, admitted to Cavairy.—Cadet Mr. A. S. Pemberton, admitted to arth, and prom. to 2d licut.—Cadets G. P. Ball, Wm.Thouson, T. T. Christle, Wn. Brown, N. P. M. Dougall, S. V. W. Hart, and H. C. Rolnson, admitted to Infantry, and prom. to Ensigns.—Messra. Jas. Williamson, John Wye, A. M. K. Lyon, W. R. Deacon, Geo. Grey, J. J. Thourson, Jas. Murray, and H. P. Hathorn, admitted as assist. surgeons.

Lieut. W. C. Bell, 2d Europ. regt., having quitted India without permission from govern-ment, struck off strength of army from 8th Oct. 1827

Nov. 1.—Commissariat. The following promo-Nov. 1.—Commissariat. The following promo-tions and appointments made, v. Capt. Waite, returned to Europe:—Capt. Holland, 3d assist, to be a 2d assist. com. gen., v. Molesworth, de-tached on other duty, and to relieve Capt. Long: 2d assist. Cutch force.—Sen. acting 3d assist. Lieut-Payne, confirmed a 3d assist. com. gen.—Capt. Le Messurier to be an acting 3d assist. com. gen., in room of Capt. Holland.—Lieut. Stack, lat Gr. N. I., to act as 3d wasis. com. gen. for Capt. Campbell, on leave to see.—Lieut. Davidson, 17th regt., to be acting 3d assist. temporary attached.

Non 6th.—2d Europ. Regt. Ens. L. M. M'Intyre, to be Lieut. v. W. C. Bell, struck off: dated 9th

Nov. 1827.

5th N. I. Ens. J. C. Heath, to be Lieut., v. Carthew, dec.: dated ditto.

Adv. I. Lieut. C. Johnson, to be Capt., and Ens. R. Hughes, to be Lieut. J. Buston, to be Ederton, cashiered; dated ditto.

5th N.I. Lieut. F. D. Bagshaw to be qu.-mast. and interp., in Hindoostance language; dated 1st Nov. 1827.

Nov. 7 .- Lieut. Col. E. Frederick, 26th N.I., to be military secretary to Hon, the Governor.

Capt. G. Graham, H.M.'s 2d or Queen's Royal regt., and Capt. R. E. Burrowes, H.M.'s 20th Foot, to be Aides-de-Camp to Hon. the Governor.

Cornet I. B. Hamilton, 1st L.C., to proceed to ersia on a special duty under instructions from Political department.

Nov. 8.—Assist. Surg. Thos. Lawrence admitted on estab. from 4th Nov. 1827.

Nov. 12.—Lieut. Col. W. Meall, 12th N.I., per-mitted to retire from service on pension of his

Capt. J. II. Dunsterville, 12th N.I., and paymat presidency, app. agent for clothing the army, from date of departure of Maj. D. H. Beliasis, for Temporary appointments confirmed. Lieut, G. Birdwood to act as adj. to 3d N.I. until arrival of Lieut. Hallet.—Ens. T. Jackson, 10th N.I., to act as interp. In Hindoostance language to 2d Extra bat. until arrival of officer app. to situation.

Nov. 15.— Surg. J. G. Moyle to be medical store-keeper at presidency, v. Wailace on furlough to Europe.—Surg. Moyle also to succeed Surg. Wal-lace as civil surg. at presidency.

Surg. C. Kane to have medical charge of European general hospital at presidency, in room of Surg. Moyle.

Non. 17.—1st Europ. Regt. Lieut. C. Hagart to be capt., and Ens. B. Mitchell to be lieut., in suc. to Watts dec.; dated 6th Nov. 1827.

1st L.C. Cornet T. B. Hamilton to be lieut., v. Wilks dec.; dated 8th Nov. 1827.

1st Lieut. C. Henry (recently prom.) posted to regt. of artillery.

regt. of artillery.

Ensigns (recently prom.) posted to regts. C. A. Echalaz, to 10th N.1.; C. I. Curtis, 18th do;. Thos. Edmunds, 3d do-; John Jessop, 12th do; A. C. Donaldison, 2d. Europ. regt.; P. C. N. Amlel, 1st or Gr. N.1.; T. R. Stewart, 10th N.1.; John Sunclair, 2d do; H. W. Tophan, 7th do; Fred. Westbrook, 18th do;; A. M. Haselwood, 3d oc. Edw. Green, 2lst do; John Ramsay, 1st Europ. regt.; H. S. Hutchmson, 5th N.1.; R. N. Moade, 2lth do.; E. R. Elwal, 2d Cr. N.1.; H. Cograve, 18th N.1.; G. F. Sympson, 2d Europ. regt.

Caste C. S. Hoders admitted to infantry, and Cadet C. S. Hodges admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign

Nov. 20.—Capt. L. J. Frederick to be inspecting engineer, Surat division of army, in consequence of departure of Lieut. Col. Drummond for Europe.

Capt. R. Pougat to be superintending engineer at presidency.

Nov. 21.—Cornets (recently prom.) posted to regts. W. J. Tudor, to 1st L.C.; W. B. C. Roberts, to 2d do.

Returned to duty, from Europe.-Lieut. H. H. Hobson, 20th N.I., and Cornet F. B. Hamilton, 1st L.C.; both arrived 26th Oct. 1827.

MARINE PROMOTIONS.

Bombay Castle, Sept. 12, 1827.—1st-Lieut. T. K. Terrell to be junior capt.; dated 10th July 1825.

2d-Lieut. W. L. Clements to be 1st-lieut.; dated ditto.

Sen. Midsh. H. Rose to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to Jumor Capt. J. S. Criddle retired 9th July 1824; dated ditto.

Sen. Midsh. G. Harvey to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to 2d-Lieut.

2d-Lieut. T. B. Davis dec. 15th July 1825; dated 10th July 1825.

Jun. Capt. P. Maughan to be sen. capt.; dated 2d Sept. 1825.

1st-Lieut. J. J. Robinson to be junior capt.; dated ditto.

2d-Lieut. R. Lowe to be 1st-lieut.; dated ditto-Sen. Midsh. W. R. Hayman to be 2d-lieut., in uc. to Sen. Capt. C. Sealy dec. 1st Sept. 1825;

suc. to Ser dated ditto. 2d-Lieut. C. Wells to be 1st-lieut.; dated 29th Oct. 1825.

Sen. Midsh. A. Nott to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to 1st-Lieut. E. Pratt pensioned 28th Oct. 1825; dated ditto.

1st-Lieut. C. F. Grice to be junior capt.; dated 18th April 1826.

2d-Lieut. F. W. Powell to be 1st-lieut.; dated ditto.

Sen. Midsh. W. Hodges to be 2d-lieut., in sucto Jun. Capt. J. J. Robinson dec. 17th April 1826;

1st-Lieut. J.W. Guy to be jun. capt.; dated 24th April 1826.

2d-Lieut. W. Lowe to be Ist-lieut.; dated ditto. Midsh. A. Williams to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to unior Capt. G. Herne dec. 23d April 1826; dated

2d-Lieut, T. H. Broadhead to be 1st-lieut.; dated 8th May 1826

Midsh, P. L. Powell to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to 1st. Lieut. Powell dec. 7th May 1826; dated ditto. 2d-Lieut. J. B. Harrison to be 1st-lieut., in suc. to 1st-Lieut. C. Wells degraded in rank; dated 10th June 1826.

Sen. Capt. J. Jeaks to be commodore; dated 19th June 1936.

Jun. Capt. D. Jones to be sen. capt.; dated ditto. 1st-Lieut, W. S. Collinson to be junior capt.; dated ditto.

2d-Lieut. J. H. Rowland to be 1st-lieut.; dated ditto.

Midsh. C. R. Richards to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to Commodore Manwaring dec. 18th June 1826; dated

2d-Lieut. W. Igglesdon to be 1st-lleut.; dated 2d Jan. 1827

Scn. Midsh. C. Sharp to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to 1st-Lieut. Broadhead dec. 1st Jan. 1827; dated ditto.

Jun. Capt. H. Hardy to be sen. capt.; dated 11th March 1827.

1st-Lieut. Minchin to be jun. capt.; dated ditto. 2d-Lieut. S. B. Haines to be 1st-lieut; dated ditto.

Sen. Midsh. H. Whitelock to be 2d-lieut. in suc. to Sen. Capt. Blast retired 10th March 1827; dated 1st-Lieut. G. Grant to be jun. capt.; dated 18th March 1827.

2d.Lieut, C. Wells to be 1st-lieut.; dated ditto. Sen. Midsh. S. Newnham to be 2d-lieut., in suc-to Junior Capt. Maillard dec. 17th March 1827; dated ditto.

2d-Lieut. G. B. Harrison to be 1st-lieut.; dated 10th May 1927.

Sen. Midsh. H. N. Poole to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to 1st-lieut. G. Vernon dec. 9th May 1827 dated ditto.

Sept. 12. - 1st-Lieut. Wm. Gwilt to be junior capt., dated 2d Sept. 1827.

2d-Lieut. T. E. Rogers to be Ist-lieut.; dated Sen. Midsh. Wm. Bowater to be 2d-lieut., in suc. to Capt. Ferrell pensioned 1st Sept. 1827; dated Nov. 1.—R. Morgan, H.C.'s Marine, to the com-modore on Surat station, on Capt. J. R. Laurence vacating that situation.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Sept. 8. Licut. G. Rowley, 2d L.C., for health.—12. Licut. W. P. Phipps, 22d N.I., for health.—Oct. 18. Capt. G. Arden, 8th N.I.—26.

Ens. L. M. M'Intyre, 2d Europ. regt., for health.—31. Lieut. W. Meeke, 3d L.C., for health.—Nov. 6. Lieut. J. Wright, 3d N.I., for health.—Surg. R. Wallace, medical storkeeper.—8. Lieut. Col. J. S. R. Drummond, inspecting engineer, Surat div., for health.—21. Assist. Surg. C. Downey, for health.

To Cape of Good Hope.—Nov. 8. Capt. W. Wilkings, 1st L.C., for 12 months, for health.—21. Maj. D. H. Bellasis, 3d N.I., for health (eventu-

Maj. D. H. Beilses, ou M.I., for health (eventually to Europe).

To Sea.—Nov. 17. Lieut. W. Long, 8th N.I., for six months, for health.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE HON. M. ELPHINSTONE.

Meeting of British Inhabitants .- Agreeably to a requisition to the sheriff, a meeting of the British inhabitants of Bombay was held at the mess room of the town harracks, on the 5th November, to consider the most appropriate means of testifying their regard for the Hon. Mounstuart Elphinstone, prior to his departure for Europe.

Thomas Buchanan, Esq. was unanimously called to the chair.

Letters were read from the British inhabitants at Surat and Bhooj, declaratory of their entire concurrence in all the measures which this meeting might adopt for carrying into effect the purposes for which it was convened; and an intimation from the gentlemen composing the deputation from Poonah, stating that though the British inhahitants in Dukhun had presented a separate address to Mr. Elphinstone, they would be happy to concur in whatever resolutions this meeting might pass for perpetuating, by permanent memorials, the remembrance of those sentiments which had been so universally produced by the private and public conduct of Mr. Elphinstone.

Lieut. Col. Leighton, C.B, proposed the following resolution: "That this meeting, contemplating the approaching departure of the Hon. Mounstuart Elphinstone, on his resignation of the go-vernment of this presidency, with sincere and profound regret, are of opinion that the remembrance of his public and private virtues, which have excited general respect, esteem, and admiration, ought to be perpetuated by some permanent memorial." In the course of a short speech, he remarked that the name of Mr. Elphinstone will long be associated with brilliant and memorable events in India. "He was at the battle of Assave on the 23d September 1803, and he was again in the midst of fire animating the troops to vic-victory at the battle of Kirkee on this day, the 5th of November, ten years ago, and when gallantry is spoken of on those and other occasions in this country, his name will never be forgotten. He has in my opinion a peculiar claim to the respect, esteem and admiration of the army; but to these he is also justly entitled from the whole whole of the community, for his uniform kindness, many virtues, diversified abilitics, and the many and great improvements which have taken place under his government.

W. Newnham, Esq. seconded the resolution in a very long and eloquent speech, in which he adverted to the general feeling of regret which seemed to pervade all ranks, classes, and castes, at the loss of their late governor. He then gave the following summary of the history of Mr. Elphinstone: "It is now more than thirty years since the Hon. Mountsuart Elphinstone, descended from an ancient family on which he himself reflects the greatest lustre, landed on the shores of India, a member of the Bengal Civil Service. It is true that he still belongs to that establishment, but he has lived among us so many years that he may be called the adopted child of this presidency, or, to speak with greater truth, its father and patron. From the moment of his first landing he was marked out for honour and distinction. Subsequent occurrences made it doubtful whether nature intended him for a soldier or a civilian; but experience has since proved that she intended him for both. Having chosen the political line he became assistant to the resident at Poonah, when that place was only known to us as a foreign city, to which few had then access. It was while holding this situation, that he had an opportunity of sharing in those distinguished actions of the first Mahratta war, which has, in consequence, occasioned his name to be associated with the remembrance of the battles of Assaye and Argaum and of the siege of Gyaulghur. He was deputed by the resident at Poonah as the political assistant to the Duke of Wellington, then the Hon. Major Gen. Wellesley, and accompanied him throughout the events of that memorable campaign. It is perhaps worthy of notice that in this situation Mr. Elphinstone then succeeded the honourable and distinguished officer who has within these few days succeeded him in the government of this Presidency. For Sir John Malcolm had been first appointed to this delicate and confidential situation, but, having been compelled by illness to leave the army after the fall of Ahmednuggur, he was replaced by Mr. Elphinstone. It was thus that Mr. Elphinstone was afforded an opportunity of displaying in that campaign that gallantry and intrepidity for which he is so eminently distinguished, and which led him, as I have heard, at the capture of Gyaulghur, to be actually one of the storming party. The fall of this almost impregnable fortress was soon after succeeded by peace with the Mahratta powers, when Mr. Elphinstone, notwithstanding his short standing in the service, was on account of his conspicuous abilities appointed resident at the court of the Berar rajah; and while so employed he was subsequently selected to conduct, under circumstances of particular emergency, the embassy sent by the British government to the king of Cabul in 1808. On the termination of this embassy, Mr. Elphinstone fortunately for us and all who are interested in the honour and prosperity of this presidency, was appointed in 1810 resident at Poonah, the very same place where he had commenced his political career. It was there that we became more intimately acquainted with him-it was there that those feelings of affection, esteem, and admiration, with which we are now animated, had their birth. can look back with pleasure and satisfaction on the days which I have passed in participation of the princely hospitality of the Sangum, and the instructive society of its enlightened proprietor, and I may safely say there never was any individual that excited greater enthusiasm around him in all ranks than did Mr. Elphinstone whenever he appeared-whether it was in the pursuits of sport, in field against an enemy, or in the labours of the cabinet. " Let me here, Sir, recall to your recollection that this very day is the anniversary of the battle of Kirkee; on this very day ten years ago the late Peishwa Bajee Row, whose cunning and true Mahrattalike diplomacy had never escaped the discerning eye of Mr. Elphinstone, at once broke the ties of amity which bound him to the British government, and which had just been renewed by the formal treaty concluded in the preceding month of June -broke those ties by a treacherous attack on the residency, which was burnt to the ground with all the valuable depositories of learning collected by the noble and enlightened resident, and by an attack on the British troops stationed at Kirkee. This small force Mr. Elphinstone succeeded in joining, just as it had formed to repel the attack of a far more numerous army of the Mahrattas. By his advice the plan of operations was changed from the defensive to the offensive; and hence followed the memorable action of Kirkee and the signal defeat of the Mahratta forces, which will redound to the credit of the Bombay army, and to the honour of Mr. Elphinstone's ability for war, as long as a page of history remains to tell the tale.

The speaker then read an extract from the General Orders published by the late Marquis of Hastings on the termination of the Mahratta war, dated the 29th August 1818:

"The occupation of the territories (observes his Londahip), heretofore belonging to the late Peishwa, being completed by the reduction of the last contrast of that prince in Kandeish, the Governor General in Council induges himself in the gratifying task of communicating his applause to the officers by whom the conquest has been achieved. Though the Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone does not strictly come within this description, he has had too marked a personal share in the military operations of left success by the generous examples of the success by the generous examples of the intreplidity in exigencies the most hec conduct and valour of the army. But beyond this participation in the danger of the troops, Mr. Elphinstone had, in his capacity of commissioner, so great a part in guiding the application of the force, that the favourable issue is to be mainly ascribed to his ability in his direction."

Mr. Newnham continued: "I shall

Mr. Newnham continued:-" I shall now, Sir, turn to the proceedings in Parliament, and read to you what was said of Mr Elphinstone by Mr. Canning, on moving the vote of thanks to the army of India on the termination of the war. On that occassion Mr. Canning, after adverting to the peace concluded with the Peishwa in June, observed:

wa in June, observed:

"In the midst of this unsuspecting tranquillity, at a moment now known to have been concerted with the other Mahratta chieftains, the Pelshwa manifested his real intentions by an unprovoked attack upon the residency. Mr. Eiphinstone, a name distinguished in the literature, as well as in the politics of his country, exhibited on that trying occasion military curage and skill, which, though valuable accessaries to diplomatic talents, we are not entitled to require a talent, and not on that occasion only, but imany others in the course of this singular canage, Mr. Eiphinstone displayed talents and resources, which would have rendered him no mean general in a country where generals are of ho mean excellence and reputation."

"This is the personage, Sir, whose de-

" This is the personage, Sir, whose departure we have this day met to distinguish by an appropriate tribute of regret and applause. For the last eight years has he presided over this government, and the preeminent abilities which he has displayed in that high and honourable situation have fully confirmed those opinions of his powerful mind and political capacity which had been formed from his successful and prosperous administration of the Dukhun. There is, however, one point of Mr. Elphinstone's character on which I have not touched, and yet it is the most amiable, I allude to his unassuming, retiring disposition, which has been strongly exemplified in the singular circumstance of his resigning office, and the splendid income attached to it, though he might have retained both up to the period of his embarkation, and is now living among us as a private individual."

The resolution was carried nem. con. George Norton, Esq., (the Advocate General) then moved a resolution to this effect: "that it appears to this meeting that the most appropriate memorials for perpetuating the remembrance of Mr. Elphinstone's public and private virtues are, his statue to be sculptured in marble and crected in a suitable place at Bombay, and a service of plate to be prepared and presented to him in England."

In the course of an able speech, he observed that we may calculate how much we owe to his distinguished qualities, contrasting the present situation of affairs around us with the convulsions, which through a well known confederacy threatened to shake India to its foundation. "The display of his extraordinary capa. city at that crisis, has attracted much at. tention, and we cannot withhold our consent to the justice of those observations, corroborated as they are by the eloquent culogium of the present Premier of England, which have ascribed to him a combination of both civil and military genius. But a much higher praise remains He has exemplified in a signal manner. that noble art which acquires for the conqueror the truest glory: I mean, of attaching to his sway the people, whom he has subdued. How has the liberal plan of power by which he has governed the native provinces, the liberal institutions which he has founded and supported, the mildness of his administration, called forth the united voice of the native population in a manner altogether unprecedented. a voice far too loud to be mistaken or misrepresented! By the imperceptible introduction of new and fair and liberal laws which it has been his fortune recently to embody in one digested code-by the access he has afforded to all ranks according to their station to the very source of their government, he has opened to the sight at least of our Indian fellow-subjects those principles of constitutional power, which are the best security for national advance-But I must not be misunderstood. I am far from attributing to Mr. Elphinstone the sudden and rash introduction of those visionary schemes of political liberty among this recently reduced people, which some advocate or pretend to do,-measures as ill adopted to their habits, feelings, and comprehension as ruinous to their peace, I should hold it an accusation, which no man would be justified in making. All national improvement, to be effectual, must be gradual. We are apt to become warped by our attachment to our own constitution, and sometimes conceive its principles to be of universal application. forget the slow growth of its highest maxims in our own country, and the mtellectual meridian in which, and in which alone, according to my notions, they are calculated to shine. I am free to hold that the improvement and civilization of the mind must long precede the full prevalence of constitutional franchises, and am one of those who conceive that the national independence of India at this juncture would lead to nothing but national disaster and perhaps irremediable degradation. The tree itself of political liberty cannot be transplanted, but its seeds may stock, may replenish the earth. At the same time the earlier shoots must bend and sway with the influence of the atmosphere in which they are reared.

This resolution was seconded by J Wedderburn, Esq., and carried unanimously.

Lieutenani

Lieutenant Colonel Kennedy then moved, that a Committee be appointed to carry an address to Mr. Elphinstone. for the nurpose of conveying to him the senuments of sincere and profound regret with which the British Inhabitants of Rombay and its dependencies contemplate his approaching departure from the country, and to acquaint him with the present resolutions: which was agreed to, having been seconded by M. T. D. De Vitre, Esq.

It was then proposed by James Forbes, Esq, seconded by Captain J. H. Dunsterville, that a Subscription be opened for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of the second Resolution, which was agreed to, and a Committee appointed to appropriate the funds arising therefrom.

An address having been prepared, it was agreed to, and after thanks had been voted to the Chairman and the Sheriff, the meeting broke up.

The following is a copy of the address, which was presented to Mr. Elphinstone on the 14th November, and of Mr. Elphinstone's reply.

phintstone's reply.

To the Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone, late Governor of Bombay.
Honourable Sir.—We, the undersigned British inhabitants of Bombay and its dependencies, cannot permit your departure from the country, and the state of the state of the publicly the profound that and reasons the publicly the profound that and the publicly that the profound that are the professions the mere tribute of application that the professions the mere tribute of application that it is customary to present to a governor or resigning his government, but the sincere and engaging friendliness, united to the various acquirements and commanding abilities of a powerful and richly cultivated unitd, must invariably inspire.

Gifted with talents of the highest order, you could not fail to attract the notice of your superiors from your earliest arrival in India, and their selecting you for public situations of the highest importance has been fully justified by the zealous, meritorious, and able manner in which the various duties entrusted to your charge have been at all times performed. Having chosen the political demars performed. Traving chosen he pointed and partment of the service, your emlnent qualifica-tions obtained the marked approbation of that dis-tinguished diplomatic character, the late Sir Barry fugushed diplomatic character, the late 'sir Barry Clase, under whose ausplese you commenced your public career, and lest to your being appointed relident at the court of the Rajah of Nagpore in 1863. Five years afterwards, while thus employed, you were selected for the difficult and delicate rounduct of an embassy to the King of Cabul, and immediately on its conclusion nominated to be resident at Poonah. It was then that we became more particularly acquainted with your private further and the property and during a period support of the property of the property and during a period support of the property of the pro virtues and political capacity, and, during a period of sixteen years, while we have been delighted of statem years, write we have been defigured with the courtesy and affability of the polished gentleman, we have at the same time observed with admiration the firmness and sagacity of the accomplished statesman; but it must remain for the historian to appreciate and to record, in meritthe historian to appreciate and to record, in menti-cide terms of commendation, the conciliatory but undaunted conduct which you displayed in the embarrassing and dangerous discharge of your official duties during the last years of the late Prishwah's government; the essential assistance which you contributed, both by your presence and counsels, to the successful termination of the war in the Decemant the able measures which ant counsels, to the successful termination of the war in the Deccan, and the able measures which you adopted for rendering the unavoidable extension of British power, the source of unknown felicity to the inhabitants, of the conquered termination.

Of the manner in which you have presided over the government of this presidency, during the sce.—Bombay.

Isst eight years, it would not become us to express circumstantially the opinion which we have for circumstantially the opinion which we have for circumstantially the opinion which we have for the circumstantially the opinion which it is for distinguished approbation to which it for many causes to justly entitled. But we may be allowed to observe, that during this period commerce has been encouraged by the content of the convenience of the mercantile orientally in the convenience of the mercantile orientally into the convenience of the mercantile oriental all its branches, and these improvements have been rendered of permanent utility by a retision of the code of civil regulations, and by a retision of the code of civil regulations, and the native languages, customs, and laws which you one elliptured measures and discriminating patient have been introduced in the junior civil servants. Nor new elliptured measures and discriminating patient have been introduced in the pulsor civil servants. the junior civil servants. Nor have the military and marine services benefited in a less degree, since in them likewise have been introduced im-portant ameliorations in every department, and the comfort and accommodation of the troops and seamen have been ensured by a judicious and un-exampled liberality. In consequence also of the erection of churches, the consideration evinced for the interests of religion, and the successful measures adopted for the education of the children measure adopted for the education of the children of Europeans, Christianity has been enabled to diffuse most efficaciously through these territories its benign influence. To your wise and extended tives, therefore, must be principally ascribed the licreased prosperity of this presidency; and gratifying must it be to you to be convinced, that you have not only thus materially contributed to render this portion of the British dominions of so much greater importance to the mother country, but that you have also tanght its native subjects, from this result having been produced by essential ameliorations in their condition, to appreciate and almire the unwanted benefits which they enjoy under the British government. under the British government.

under the British government.
We are at the same time persuaded that the recollection of some of the liberal and enlightened measures which you have outsined and promoted, will afford you a more lasting gratification than those which have been adouted for the extension of moral and intellectual improvement measures the nation behalves to Kert Veryle. tension of moral and intellectual improvement amongst the native inhalustants. For it may be confidently expected, from the prosperous commencement of the endeavours now exerting for this purpose, that they will be ultimately crowned with success. But how unavailing would these efforts have proved, had it not been for the animating support with which you have so constantly concurraged and protected them! As, however, the native gentlemen have determined to testify, in a manner the most autororiate, the high respect in a manner the most appropriate, the high respect and admiration with which they regard your cha-racter, and the grateful sense which they entertain of the numerous and invaluable advantages which of the numerous and invaluable advantages which the native subjects of this presidency have derived from your auspicious government, any further remarks on this point would be superfluous. It is with mingled feelings of pleasure and regret that we now address to you these few expressions of our unfregned and heartfelt respect, as teem, and admirtion. We repole that, after an extern, and admirtion. sions of our unfeagued and heartfelt respect, es-teem, and aduration. We rejoice that, after an absence of thirty years, and after displaying in the hightest and most important situations those per-vate virtues and public qualifications with which you are so peculiarly distinguished, you are about to be restored to your home and your friends, and to that country on which you reflect so much justice, and which, we trust, may still benefit by your pre-eminent abilities, but we lament the pri-vation of that affable, pleasing, and instructive in-terrourse which has afforded us so much gratifica-tion, of animating and discriminating converses. zerourse which has afforded us so much gratifica-tion, of animating and discriminating encourage-ment which has excited zoal in all ranks, and of those commanding abilities, which have primoted with such success the welfare and prosperity of this presidency. Under such unpressions, we can only alleviate the profound regret occasioned by your departure, by uniting in success and earnest wheles that you may lone group uninterproted the half and asparture, by unting in success and earnisst wishes that you may long enjoy uninterrupted health and happiness, and by sesuring you that our breasts will ever be inspired by these sentiments, which our words have so inadequately conveyed.

worus nave so manequately conveyed.

In order also to perpetuate by ostensible memorials, the remembrance of these sentiments, and of the causes which have produced them, permit us to request that you would allow your statue to be sculptured in marble, in order that it may be erected in a suitable place in Bombay, and to solicit your acceptance of a service of plate, which will be prepared and presented to you in England. We have the honour to be, Honbrable Sir, Your most obedient and most humble servants, THOMAS BUCHANAN, Chairman; Followed by about 200 signatures. Rembay, 5th November 1927.

Mr. Elphinstone's Reply to the above Address.

Gentlemen,—I receive the honour conferred on me with gratitude proportioned to my respect for the intelligent and enlightened community from which it romes h it comes.

which it comes.

My long acquaintance with this establishment, My long acquaintance with this establishment, My long acquaintance with continuous acquaintance of the value of your opinion, and render the present an occasion of prite and gratification of which I shall never lose the impression. Qualified as you are from your character and situation to judge of my public measures, the approbation you have conferred on them is the highest reward I could receive.

Nor in this avowal of the satisfaction which I derive from your applause, do I forget how small a share I can individually claim in the proceedings that have called it forth. Much is due to the able derive from your applause, do I forget how small a share I can individually claim in the proceedings that have called it forth. Much is due to the able and estimable colleagues with whom I have been associated in the government, and much to the circumstances under which I entered on my duties. Placed at the head of an establishment which was rapidly rising in importance and increasing in extent, I found an impulse in all classes that must under any guidance have led to striking improvement. In the civil service I found an enlarged and liberal inclination to adapt our institutions to the peculiarity of our situation, and to conciliate even the prejudices of a people unaccustomed to our rule, and averse to many of our most favourite maxims of government. I found the army characterized by a spirit of discipline, order, and forbearance, calculated beyond all other means to gain the affections of the country which its valour had subdued. In all branches of the service, and in all members of the British community. I met with the same zeal for the honour of the nation, and the same expanded wish to promote the welfare of the people with whom our conquest had connected us.

In enumerating the different improvements that have taken ulace shore I have been with a promote the welfare of the people with a promote the welfare of the people with whom our conquest had the very support that the promote the welfare of the people with whom our conquest had the very support that the very support that the very support that the very support to the people with whom our conquest had the very support that the very support that the very support that the very support to the very supp section the people with whom our conquest had connected us. In enumerating the different improvements that have taken place since I have been in the government, you strongly recal my obligations to the gentermen by whose staints, industry, and ability, those measures have been brought forward and matured, and who owe little to me but for an anxious desire to encourage their labours, and to profit by the light that resulted from their enquirles and experience.

Interested as I am in the success of those institutions and in the prosperity of this presidency. I cannot but feel the liveliest pleasure when I reflect on the hands to which both are now committed. The versatile talents and sold judgment of my successor, his varied experience, his thorough knowledge of the natives and of manking, combined as they are with a kindness and benevoof my successor, his varied experience, nis transough knowledge of the natives and of mankind, combined as they are with a kindness and benevolence that cannot be suprassed, afford a certainty of rapid advance and improvement to every part of an extablishment, in which I shall never the superstanding of the succession of an extablishment of the superstanding of the succession of the superstanding of the succession of the superstanding of personal extern which such that the superstanding of personal extern which such that the superstanding of the sup

The sum subscribed to the statue of Mr. Elphinstone, to be erected in Bombay, and to the service of plate to be presented to him in England, amounted on the 24th Nov. to 51,560 rupees.

Poona Address .- A deputation consist. ing of Mr. Dunlop (the Judge of Poona), Major Snodgrass, Mr. John Warden, and Capt. Nutt, arrived in Bombay 13th No. vember, for the purpose of presenting an address in behalf of the civil and military officers serving in the Dukhun and Khan-desh, to the Hon. Mountstuart Elphin. stone, on the occasion of his resigning the government of this presidency. Agreca. bly to appointment the deputation waited upon Mr. Elphinstone at Parell house, and Mr. Dunlop read an address, which was signed by fourteen Civil Servants, one Chaplain, and one hundred and eight Military Officers; to which Mr. Elphin. stone made a suitable reply.

Address of the Clergy .- An address of the Clergy of the Established Church of England and Ireland in the presidency of Bombay, signed by Archdeacon Hawtayne and eleven other clergymen, was also presented to Mr. Elphinstone, who returned a reply acknowledging his satisfaction and gratitude.

Address from the Raja of Sattara, Native Princes, &c. - The following is copy of an address presented to Mr. Elphinstone from the Raja of Sattara, and other native allies and subjects of the Bombay government; and of Mr. Elphinstone's reply:

To the Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone, late

Honourable Sir,—We, thenative princes, chiefs, and inhabitants of Bombay, it dependencies and allied territories, cannot contem-Honourable Sir,—We, the native princes, chiefs, gentlemen, and inhabitants of Bombay, its dependencies and allied territories, cannot contemplate your approaching departure from this country, without endeavouring to express, however faintly, the most profound and lasting regret which has been occasioned in our minds by your resignation of the government of this president. For, until you became commissioner in the Decan and Governor of Bombay, never had we been a support of the commissioner of the president. For, until you became commissioner in the Decan and Governor of Bombay, never had we been a support of the principle of the control of the 1828.] Asiatio Intellige tranquillity, protection, and exemption from merous charges previously unknown, now presents an appearance the most flourishing and gracifying. In this island, also, the inhabitants can never adequately express their grateful sense of the salubrious and invaluable advantages that have resulted from the judicious and laudable liberality with which roads have been formed, and an in-exhaustible supply of water has been provided by the excavation of wells and tanks. It was, however, in the Deccan that the most favourable opportunity presented itself for your displaying with hier fullest instite those high abilities of the statesman, tempered with all the milder and engaging virtues of the private individual, which the historian will tove to commemorate. For the conciliatory and benign manner in which you divested conquest of all its terrors, and introduced the British power in the Deccan; the effectual means adopted to reader hostilities as little detrimental to the people as possible; the solici tous attention shown to the interesse and rights of all disses; the deliberate caude comment have been effected and the enlightened measures adopted for its administration of the process of the neonle.

cient form of government have been effected; and the enlightened measures adopted for its administration, promise to ensure the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the people.

Grateful however as we are for the consideration which has been evinced for our personal interests and prosperity, it is the liberal and enlightened measures which have been adopted for communicating to the people, by improved methods a knowledge of literature, science, and morality, that particularly demand our most unfeigned and heartfelt acknowledgments. To you, therefore, Honourable Sir, we find it impossible to express our graitfude in adequate terms; since, had it not been for the animating support with which you have so constantly encouraged and protected them, the efforts to excle a desire and love of intellectual and moral improvement, that have commenced so prosperously and promise to be crowned with ultimate success, must have been altogether unavailing. But permit us to acquant you that, in order to evince that we are ourselves fully persuaded that no amelioration can be of more incalculable benefit to this country than the diffusion amongst our children and countrymen of that extensive knowledge, those noble modes of thinking, those wise and iliberal principles of governing the supposition. amongst our chlores and countymen or that extensive knowledge, those noble modes of think-ing, those wise and liberal principles of govern-ment, and those sublime views of moral rectitude, by which the British are so eminently distinguish-ed, we have determined to raise a subscription by which the Britain are so reliably disciplinated, we have determined to raise a subscription amongst ourselves, which at the present moment amounts to upwards of two lars of rupees, for the purpose of founding one or more professorships for teaching the languages, liferature, sciences, and moral philosophy of Europe. Nor can we doubt that you will be pleased to comply with our earnest solicitation that we may be allowed to honour these professorships, as a slight testimony of our unceasing gratitude, with that name which we so much revere and admire, and to designate them. "Elphinstone Professorships," and that you will permit your portrait to be drawn by an able artist in England, in order that we may place it in the rooms of the Native Education Souety, as a permanent memorial of the liberal and enlightened founder and protector of that society.

and enlightened founder and protector of that society.

But, in presenting this sincere tribute of applease to the highly liberal and enlightened principles by which your public conduct has been so peculiarly characterized; it is your private virtues which have so particularly excited our admiration, gratitude, and respectful affection. For the accessibility, the absence of all form, and the urbanity with which you have always received persons of this country of all classes, the courtesy with which you have admirated them into your own parties, and the affable and unrestrained manner with which you have awe condescended to mix in with which you have condescended to mix in their society, can only be ascribed to those amiable, generous, and high-minded sentiments which shine generous, and high-ninded sentiments which shine so conspicuously in your every word and action. The causes, therefore, which now occasion our most profound and heating the consequence of being deprived of those private virtues which have raised us in our estimation, and afforded us the utmost gratification, and of those transcendant public abilities which have so effectually promoted the welfare- and prosperly of our country, and rendered - every amelioration permanent by ensuring the diffusion of intellectual and moral improvement, ase much too obvious to require Asiatic Journ, Vot. 25. No. 149.

that we should in vain endsavour to convey by words those feelings by which we are at present so oppressed and overpowered. But, permit us to assure you, that we all unite in the most fervent so oppressed and overpowered. But, permit us to assure you, that we all unite in the most fervent prayers that you may long ethoy uninterrupted scalls and happiness in the society of those friends, and in the country, from which you have been so long separated; and that the pleasing and grateful sentiments which your private and public conduct have inspired in our breasts, will ever form the most delightful object of our contemplation; that the name of Elphinstone shall be the first that our children shall learn to liep; and that it will be our provident thuy to preserve in-delibly unto the latest posterity the fame of sepre-uniment a benefactor to our constants.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sir, we have the honour to be, Honourable Sir, when the content we have the same and cheeter servants. (See the care well-wishers and cheeter servants, and the same than the process of the British Government of Bombay.)

Mr. Elphinstone's Reply to the Address.

Mr. Elphinstone's Reply to the Address.

Gentlemen,—Nothing could have afforded ma higher satisfaction than the address with which you have been pleased to honour me on this

It records the opinion of a body of whose esteem I have always been most desirous; and it relates to subjects on which your approbation has peculiar value. The first duty of an Indian government (after securing the safety of the state) is to attend to the self-are of the native population; and the most genuine proof that it has endeavoured to fulfit the charge, it to be found in the favourable opinion of an assemblage such as that by which I have had the honour to be addressed.

the honour to be addressed.
The known character of many of the individuals to whom I am indebted for this honour, and the high place which they hold in the estimation of the public, entitle them to be considered as the representatives of all the dignity and worth of their country, and add weight to the applause to which their own authority was sufficient to give the highest value.
On these grounds I must consider the appearance of the country was sufficient to give the

On these grounds I must consider the present address as the most honourable testimony that could have been borne to my conduct, and must ever feel a high sense of the kindness of those by whom it is conferred.

whom it is conferred.
If an earnest desire to promote the welfare of my native fellow subjects could alone have entitled ne to the commendations you have bestowed. I should here conclude this part of my acknowledgment, in the confidence that the honour was not entirely undeserved; but as the success of all my endeavours, wherever they have been useful and efficacious, has originated in the spurit and maxims of the British government, of which I have been the humble lastranent, I must ascribe to the benthe humble lastranent, I must ascribe to the benthe control of the British of the Br the humble Instrument, I must acribe to the beneficent influence of that government a great portion of the feeling of which you have honoured me by making me the object.

Impressed with the highest opinion of your loyalty and attachment to the British government, and mindful of the occasions on which many of you have supported the interests of the Honourable Company, the authorities in Great Britian consider it as an imperative obligation to watch over your interests in return; in is there any course by which their favor it is on kiety to be obtained as by contributing to your welfare and conciliating your good-will.

by contributing to your weither and concinating your good-will.

Of its anxiety to promote the happiness of this part of its dominlons the Honourable Company could not have given a more convincing proof than it has just afforded, in the nomination of Sir J. Maicohn to the government of this Presidency. Distinguished, as that emilient person is, for all the qualities of a soldier and statemann, there is none for which he is more remarkable than for his extern and attachment towards the natives of this none for which he is more transable than for his esteem and attachment towards the natives of this country, and there is no character in which he is more ambitious of appearing, than that of ithe friend of india. In returning my grateful acknowledgments, for the address which has now been presented (on me is should do little justice to my own feedings, if I could conclude without noticing the impression made on me by the manner in which your approbation is to be perpetuated. By associating the present mark of your good opinion with an institution tation promotive of the education of your countrythen, you have increased beyond calculation the honour conferred on me, while you have evinced an extent of wisdom, liberality, and public spirit, which shed a luster over your own characters atill more than upon mine. This measure, if properly pursued, is worthy of the judgment and foresight with which many of you are eminently gifted, and ends to raise still higher the opinion which I had already formed of your community, and to increase the respect and regard with which I shall ever remember the valuable persons of whom I am now to take my leave.

member the valuable persons to take my leave.

However far from this place the rest of my life may be spent, I beg you to be assured that the proofs I have received of your attachment shall never be forgotten, and that I shall never cease to feel, he turnot solicitude respecting the progress of this part of the empire, and for the improvement, prosperity, and happiness of its inhabitants.

M. ELPHINSTONE.

On the evening of the 14th Nov. the European community gave a splendid ball and supper in honour of Mr. Elphinstone, at Mr. Newnham's bungalows on the esplanade. The Governor, Sir John Malcolm, was present, and the Commander-in-chief presided. About two o'clock Mr. Elphinstone, surrounded by many of his old and approved friends, took leave of the party, and immediately embarked on board the H. C. cruiser Palinurus, which conveys him to Kossier.

The subscriptions for the "Elphinstone Professorships," to be established under the Bombay Native Education Society, amounted on the 7th Nov. to 2,03,372 Bombay rupees.

VISIT OF THE GOVEANOR TO POONAH. The honourable the Governor arrived at Poonah on the 11th instant, about seven o'clock in the morning; he was received with every demonstration of respect and good feeling. A guard of honour, consisting of the Horse Artillery, the Queen's Royals, the 20th Foot, and the 11th regt. N.I., lined the road from his excellency's bungalow, half way down the river, and presented arms on his approach, the horse artillery in the meanwhile firing a salute, and the bands playing "God save the King." At the conclusion the troops fired a few de joie.

Gaieties are a foot, consequent on Sir John Malcolm's arrival, and the theatrical amateurs have put the sock and buskin in requisition. The races, it is said, are to commence on the 1st proximo.—Bom. Gaz. Dec. 16.

STEAM VESSELS.

Private letters from Bombay mention that the native builders there have been engaged in a most minute examination of the Ganges steamer, taking measurements of all her dimensions, and comparing them with the plan sent round from hence. It appears that two steam cruizers are to be built immediately, and a smaller one for a coasting packet. The Ganges excited the most lively curiosity amongst the natives at Bombay. The Parsees, in particular, crowded on board the vessel daily, to examine the engine by which such a body was propelled, without the aid of wind or tide; and some Arabs on board an Arab dow clapped their hands, and actually leaped with astonishment and delight, when they saw her with every sail furled, stemming the wind and tide, propelled by some invisible means.

LAW APPOINTMENTS.

James Dewar, Esq., barrister at law, has been appointed clerk of the crown, vice Mr. Grant, proceeded to England; and Edward Luke, Esq. attorney at law, succeeds Mr. Grant as attorney for paupers.

STORM.

This place has been visited by a severe storm. For three or four days previous to Tuesday last the atmosphere had been dense and sultry, and the sky uncommonly cloudy. On Tuesday night it came on to rain and blow with great violence, and continued without intermission until Wed. nesday morning, when about seven o'clock the rain ceased, the wind, however, not abating in the least. The loss of lives has been truly awful; between three and four hundred persons, at least it is supposed, perished in or near the harbour. Forty of the bodies were washed ashore near the light-house at Colabah, and when the tide ebbed and left them exposed, a concourse of people assembled there, and many persons found in the drowned corpses a brother, a son, a father, or a friend. It was really a melancholy scene. The sufferers were principally Borahs, proceeding to Surat with their families to celebrate the wedding of their moolnah, or high priest. It is estimated that property to the extent of fifteen lacs of rupees has been lost ou this occasion. A great number of pleasure and passage boats, bugglas (some heavily laden), dingies, &c. were driven on shore, dismasted, or sunk, and the cargoes and stores damaged or totally lost. Great fears are entertained that the havoc of the coast and to the northward has been extensive. The Bolton sailed for England on the evening in question, and must have encountered some severe squalls; but as she did not return to port, it may be concluded she proceeded safely on her voyage. But it is not to the harbour alone that the injury has become confined; the walls of most of the compounds on the esplanade were blown down, and several of the tents, after getting saturated with rain, fell upon the heads of their occupants, and contributed to the destruction of their property.-Bom. Cour., Dec 1.

Before last Wednesday's gazette issued from the press, we had just time sufficient to notice the fearful gusts of wind with which that morning was ushered in. Little did we expect to learn, however, the dreadful tales of destruction which have since poured in from every quarter. It would he endless to enumerate all the losses in craft and human lives of which we are already informed. From Goa to Cambay the coast is literally strewed with wrecks. It is apprehended that several Europeans have perished. The bodies of one or two have already been washed on shore; but at this time it would be highly improper to mention names .- Bom. Gaz. Dec. 5.

THE SHAH BYRAMGORE.

One of the China ships, the Shah Byramgore, Capt. Crocket, on her return to this port, struck at five o'clock A.M., of the morning of the 17th November, upon the Cherbaniani reef, among the Laccadives, and after every effort to save her, all hone was given up. By the latest advices no lives had been lost. This accident is attrilives had been lost. butable to the reef being incorrectly laid down in Horsburgh, and to the state of the weather the day preceding, which prevented Capt. Crocket from taking any good observations Capt. C. arrived at Mangalore on the 23d November, with his wife and family, leaving the greater part of the crew on board. The cargo of the Byramgore is supposed to be worth twelve lacs. We have no time for further details .- Ibid.

STAMP DUTY.

Letters from Bombay mention that the government had given up enforcing the observance of the stamp regulation at that presidency and at Surat, in consequence of the alarm which it had produced, and a complete stand of business which had taken place for two days .- Cal. John Bull, Nov. 23.

THE PRESS.

The new Bombay paper, the Iris, is discontinued, the editor and proprietor having become editor of the Courier.

SHIPPING

Arrivals.

Arrivals.

Nov. 4. La Virgina, Carnavant, from Marseilles.—7. La Constoner, Regnaud, from Maurituis.—11. Incomparable, Alves, from Rio de Janeiro.—21. Catedonia, Jonnson, from China—22. Recovery, Catedonia, Jonnson, from China—24. Scott, from China—25. Borbay Castle, Scott, from China.—25. Carron, M'Carthy: and Good Success, Poynton, both from China.—27. Mifford. Jackson, from China.—28. Tamarlane, Miller, from Greenock; and Hannah, Martin, from China. Dec. 4. Upton Castle, Wellaridge, from London; and Fubila, Stephenon, from Cape of Good Hope.—6. Carnet, Fraser, from Greenock.—7. Cumbrun, Blyth, from China and Singapore.—9. Turner, Leader, from Liverpool.

Departures.

Nov. 11.—Neptune, Cumberledge, and King George the Fourth, Butler, both for Calcutta.— 25. Sir William Wellace, Brown, for London; and La Constance, Regnaud, for Goa and Mau-ritius.—27. Botton, Clarkson, for London.—Dec. 2. Katharine Stewart Furbes, Chapman, for Lon-don; and Dorothy, Garnock, for Liverpool.—16. Dragon, Mackengie, for Ceylon.

BIRTHE

Oct. 18. At Rutnagherry, the lady of D. Shaw, Esq., M.D., of a daughter, 23. At Poons, the lady of Lleut. C. Eyre, H.M.'s 98th regt., of a son. Nov. I. The lady of Mr. L. J. Miguel, of a

Noe. 1. The lady of Mr. L. J. Bilguer, on a daughter.

9. In Milltary Square, within the fort of Bombay, Mrs. White, of a daughter.

13. At Poona, the lady of Major Snodgrass, assist. com. gen., or a daughter.

17. At Ahmedabad, the lady of John Vibari, Esq., civil service, of a son.

At Colabah, the wife of Mr. H. Enderwick, of a daughter.

18. In Rampart Row, the lady of the late R. Baxter, Esq., of a daughter.

Doc. 2. The lady of Capt. Law, artillery, of a son.

Dec. 2. The lady of John Bax, Eaq., of a son.
5. The lady of John Bax, Eaq., of a son.
7. At Muzagon, the lady of Capt. C. B. James, acting secretary to Military Board, of a son.
— At Prospert Lodge, the Lady of Capt. Humphrey Lyons, of adaughter.
11. At Poonah, the lady of Lieut. T. Probys, ploneers, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Nov. 8. At St. Thomas's Church, Lieut. A. Hano, 2d Gren, regt., to Miss Watson. 12. At St., Thomas's Church, M. De Vitre, Esq., to Mrs. Mary Slater, second daughter of John Rose, Esq., Essex Street, Strand, and sister to Mrs. Norton, lady of the advocate general of this

Mrs. Fortum, and presidency.

20. At St. Thomas's Church, Ens. W. Edwards, 5th N.I., to Caroline, eldest daughter of Major F.

7. Nugent Kirkland, Esq., of the civil service, to Elizabeth Sper Woodward, fifth daughter of Starr Wood, Esq., Hill, near Southampton.
Dec. 4. At Malligaum, C. Lucas, Esq., horse brigade artillery, to E. Story, second daughter of the late Capt. G. Story, H.M.'s 8th Lt. Drags.

DEATHS.

Oct. 14. At Surat, W. A. Jones, Esq., judge and criminal judge of that city and zillah.

15. At Brodra, Lieut. and Adj. Peyton, 10th

15. At brouns, Lieux and Sames Falconer, 1st 18. At Ahmedabad, Capt. James Falconer, 1st or Gren. N.I., much regretted by his brothr officers. 28. At Colabah, the lady of T. C. Fraser, Esq., civil service, aged 27. 29. At Baroda, Lieut. Edm. Carthew, 5th N.I.,

aged 27.
31. At Jambossir, of fever, the lady of Capt. T.

31. At Jambosen, of tever, the tady of Capt. Rose, assist, qu. mast. gen.
Nov. 5. In camp, near Kholapoor, of cholers, Capt. John Watts, 1st Bombay Europ. regt.
7. At Kairs, of fever, Lieut. Henry Wilks, 1st
L.C.

9. Mr. J. Warren, band master of the 2d N.I., aged 28.

aget 2n.
17. At Surat, Capt. H. Newton, provincial major of brigade to the Surat division of the army,
22. Maria Francisca, wife of Mr. Stephen John

Cross, aged 30.
26. At Surat, Amelia, daughter of the Rev.
W. Fyyle, aged six years.
29. At Dhoolia, of fever, Mr. W. S. Kynaston, of the civil service, aged 19.

Ceplon.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS.

At a special meeting of the Supreme Court of Judicature, holden at the Court-House, October 10th, the Hon. Sir Richard Ottley, Knight, late Puisne Justice, took the oaths as Chief Justice, that office being vacant by the death of the late Sir Hardinge Giffard. The Hon. Henry Mathews, Esquire, late His Majesty's Advocate Advocate Fiscal, having produced a commission under the hand and seal of His Excellency the Governor, appointing him to the vacant office of Puisne Justice, the usual oaths were administerd to him, and he took his seat on the Bench as Puisne Justice. After which, Charles Marshall, Esquire, Master in Equity, having heen in like manner appointed by His Excellency the Governor, to the vacant office of His Majesty's Advocate Fiscal, was sworn in as Advocate Fiscal accordingly. — Ceylon Gaz. Oct. 13.

FANCY BALL AT THE EING'S HOUSE.

On the 20th November, His Exc. the Governor and Lady Barnes gave a splendid Fancy Ball at the King's House, which was attended by almost every individual of both sexes, composing the society of this place. The occasion of the entertainment was the celebration of the second antiversary of the birth of their Excellency's little daughter. The cards of invitation were issued twenty days prior to the day of the ball, for the purpose of affording sufficient time to the Ladies and Gentlemen of the settlement, to prepare their respective dresses. For many days pre-ceding that of the ball, the ingenuity of the natives, under the superintendence of their head men bad been exercised in decorating the exterior of the King's House with all that light, but elaborate beauty, which they so peculiarly well know how to effect, by means of the white coco-nut leaf, the native mosses of the jungles, and the lovely flowers which abound in the vicinity of Colombo. Triumphal arches and superb colonnades arose in majestic grace, along the entire front of the Governor's residence, while a road formed of pillars richly ornamented with flowers and coco-nut leaves, lead to the portico or entrance to the mansion. A crowd of natives thronged round the front of the King's house, to witness, we believe, the first scene of the kind that had ever taken place in this Island, at least within the memory of British rule. The eutertainment was of a mixed character, including both fancy dress and masquerade; there were not less than 350 brilliant costumes present. The character which attracted most observation was that of a "Coco-nut Gentleman": the following is a description of this vegetable dandy. He wore a huge wig admirably fitted on his head; consisting of long bushy coir stalks for hair, standing thickly on end, "like quills upon the fretful por-cupine;" the dimensions of this wig were enormous. He wore pantaloons made of the thick young husk of the coco-nut tree, and a waistcoat of the same vegetable ma-His coat was of plaited olla or green coco-nut leaf, of the latest fashion, with variegated steel buttons. On the whole, his figure was quite unique, and though, perhaps, his dress may never become a national costume, the inventor of it is not undeserving of merit, from its unequalled grotesqueness and unparelleled singularity.

NEW SCHOOL FOR NATIVE YOUTH.

His Excellency the Governor and Lady Barnes, the Chief Justice Sir Richard Ottley, Major Gen. Sir Hudson Lowe, and the principal English inhabitants, civil and military, of Colombo, were present on the 8th Nov, at the laying of the foundation stone of a building to be erected at Cotta, by the Church Missionary Society, for the gratuitous education and maintenance of a select number of Singahalese and Tamul youths of that island.

ELEPHANT HUNTING.

The confidence which many of our best Elephant shots have acquired in coolly awaiting the near approach of their game, until sure of bagging it, induced a lady in this neighbourhood, a few days since, to accompany a party that she might witness the destruction of one of those monsters of our jungles. Intelligence having been received of a herd then in a thick jungle, the party proceeded towards the intended scene of slaughter; upon arriving at the jungle, where they dismounted and sent the horses to the rear, the party took post in a small open space, where it was supposed the Elephants would break cover; all was now arranged for the attack-primings carefully examined, and caps adjusted on their respective Mantons. The beaters were then sent round to the opposite skirt of the jungle, with orders to advance in the direction of the party, and cautioned not to commence beating until elose on the elephants. The pause that now takes place generally proves the most anxious and exciting part of the sport; as from the fine sense of hearing which the elephant is possessed of, the most perfect silence is at this time absolutely necessary, in order to insure the elephants being forced to come out at the desired spot. The beaters at last struck up their hideous yells, which mingled with the noise of their tom-toms, and the harsh discordant notes of the Singhalese trumpet, produced a combination of sounds, which to a person new to the sport creates an aukward sensation. A tremendous crush and rushing sound is now heard from the jungle in front of the party, the smaller underwood is observed in motion, and two enormous elephants rush out exactly opposite the small clumps of jungle where the lady was placed, both of which are instantly floored by her protecting knights .- the two monstrous trophies were thus laid prostrate within a few yards of her feet.

BIRTHS.

oct. 11. At Jaffins Mallagam, Mrs. Speldewinde, wife of H. G. Speldewinde, Esq. Sitting Magis-trate at that station, of a daughter. Lately. At Jaffinapatnam the lady of W. Gisborne, Esq. Collector of the District, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Nor. 12. At Point De Galle, Capt. J. M. Dalzell, H. M. 16th Infranty, to Susan Eleanor, third daughter of the late Rev. John Alexander, of prunrancy Glebe, Westmeath. 28. At Jaffus, Mr. Slemmerman, to Agnes, daughter of Joan Rodrigo.

Penana.

APPOINTMENTS

Nov. 15-Mr. John Poynton to be high sheriff of Prince of Wales's Island, Singapore, and Malacca. Mr. J. W. Salmond to be accountant general to court of Prince of Wales' Island.

Mr. Surg. W. E. E. Conwell to officiate as super-Mr. Surg. W. E. E. Conwent to officiate as super-intending surgeon during absence of Superintend-ing Surg. Alexander.
Mr. K. Marchison to be resident councillor of Singapore, and to relieve Hon. Mr. Prince, who proceeds to Europe on furlough.

proceeds to Europe on rurrough.
Mr. John Patullo to be deputy resident at Prince of Wales's Island, collector of excise duties, and registrat of impores and exports.
Mr. P. O. Carneyy ta officiate as collector of excise duties and registrat of imports and exports until arrival of Mr. Patullo from Malacca.

('apt. James Low to be deputy superintendant of Capt. Ker to act as local military paymaster.

Mr. J. C. Boswell admitted as an assist. surg. upon this estab., and attached to general hospital.

DUTY ON OPIUM.

By an official notification, the following duty is imposed on foreign opium:

All opium, excepting opium made within the limits of the territories immediately dependent on the presidency of Fort William, shall on importation by sea into any port or place within the limits of the territories dependent on the presidency of Prince of Wales Island, be subject to a duty at the rate of six Spanish dollars per lb.

THE LATE PENANG GAZETTE.

In page 278 we inserted a paragraph from the Singapore Chronicle, which stated as "a matter of fact," that the Penang Garctie was supressed in consequence of an article in it giving umbrage to the Bengal government. This assertion turns out to be untrue. The Penang Register of Sept. 26th states that the Gazette was voluntarily discontinued by its proprietor, in consequence of the publisher being officially desired to expunge the words it had always borne under its title line, " Published under the authority and patronage of Government," and to insert the same notice with respect to government advertisements as that adopted by the Singapore and Malacca journals generally, with a view of abolishing all shew of preference.

BIRTHS.

Sept. 7. Mr. 3. Paisser, of a daughter. Nov. 24. The lady of John Anderson, Esq., se-cretary to government, of, a daughter. Der. 3. The lady of R. F. Wingrove, Esq., of the civil service, of a still-born son.

MARRIAGE.

Oct. 17. A. M. Bond, Esq., of the civil service of this presidency, to Maria, daughter of Capt. Jas. Salmond, late of the Bencoolen establish-

DEATES.

Aug. 5. Capt. Wm. Brooke, of the Madras artillery, commissary of ordnance at this presidency; aged 30.

Nov. 24. Sophia, youngest daughter of the late Mr. Conductor T. Green, of the Madras establishment.

25. Elizabeth Caroline, wife of Mr. C. Berlle, of the pay office.

Dec. 5. Mr. Wm. Bruce, late chief officer of the ship Eleanor.

Malacca.

GOLD MINE.

The Malacca Observer of Nov. 6, communicates the substance of a report sent in to the local government, respecting a Gold Mine, lately discovered at Bukit Taong, within three days' journey of Malacca, and not far distant from Mount Ophir, or Gunong Ledang. The report is drawn up by an individual holding a responsible situation in Malacca, on the authority of a Malay named Hadgee Amat, who had been at the mine, and states that he with six more, collected in two months and a half, 24 bungkals of gold, procured with little labour The method of work. ing consists in digging for a certain stone interspersed with a yellow substance, which is gold, and by pounding the stone in a mortar and sifting it, the particles of gold are got, a sample of which has been sent in for inspection. The depth to which they dig for the stone varies from one to twelve fathoms. The only people found here about are Jakons, or Wild Men, who occupy a small village composed of about fifteen huts, and who, strange to say, claim the ground as their property, and seize whatever gold is collected. The abovementioned Amat had all his taken from him on his way to Malacca. It is stated that one person could procure one and a half catty of gold in a year; supposing therefore that 300 persons were employed on account of the Company, there would be 450 catties got in a twelvemonth, which selling at the average price of 500 Spanish dollars per catty, would realize the sum of 225,000 Spanish dollars. A later account states that, whatever may be the real value of this mine, it is supposed that the Company cannot claim it, as the district in which it is situated is not included within their territories. The proper boundary, however, seems uncertain.

MARRIAGES.

Oct. 16. Mr. Joseph Neubronner, to Miss C. H. Moser. Nov. 6. W. T. Lewis, Esq. C. S. to Miss Neubronner.

Singapore.

Oct. 10. Lieut. S. R. Hicks. Adj. 35th Madras N. I. to Sarah Kennedy, only daughter of Lieut. Col. Com. C. Farran, of the Madras Army.

DEATH.

Sept. 12. Mr. Richard Winter, late of the Ben-coolen Establishment.

Persia.

The St. Petersburgh Journal of the 5th April contains a manifesto from the Emperor Nicholas announcing the conclusion of a treaty of perpetual peace between Russia and Persia, signed on the 16th (22d) February at Turkmanchal, by Gen. Paskewitsch and the Councillor of State Oberskoff on the part of Russia, and Prince Abbas Mirza on the part of Persia, of which the following is the substance.

" 1st. There shall be perpetual peace, friendship, &c. "2d. The treaty of Gulistan to be dissolved, and the present substituted:

"3d. Persia cedes the Khanate of Erivan, on either side of the Araxes, and the Khanate of Nakhichevan; and all the public documents connected with those two provinces shall be delivered within six months.

4th. Details, with great minuteness, the future frontier line between the two empires. It begins at the point of the Ottoman states, the nearest to Little Ararat, and crosses that mountain to the source follows the of the Lower Karasson, source of that river till it falls into the Araxes opposite Cherour, and then follows the course of the latter river as far as to the fortress Abbas-Abad. This fortress, situated on the right bank, together with the surrounding country to the extent of three wersts and a half, is to belong to The frontier line then again Russia. follows the course of the Araxes as far as twenty-one wersts beyond the ford of Jedlboulouk, from which point a straight line is to be drawn across the plain of Monghaw to the bed of the river Bolgarou, twentyone wersts above the point of confluence of the two rivers Odinabazar and Sarakamyclic. The line then passes across the summit of Djlkoir, so that all waters falling into the Caspian belong to Russia; and continues to cross the summit of other mountains, observing the above principle, relative to rivers falling into the Caspian, to the source of the river Artara, the course of which, as it falls into the Caspian, completes the whole line of frontier. " 5th. The Shah confirms the above line of frontier.

"6th. Persia to pay an indemnity of 80,000,000 rubles.

"7th. Prince Abbas Mirza is recognized as heir apparent to the throne of Persia.

"8th. The Russians to enjoy the free navigation of the Caspian. The Persians to enjoy the same on the old footing, Russia alone to have armed vessels on the "9th. Ambassadors to be received by both parties with all due honours,

" 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th, regulate the nomination of consuls, and the transfer of private property, as also a mutual enlargement of prisoners.

" 14th. No deserters to be given up by either party.

" 15th. An amnesty to be awarded by Persia to the inhabitants of the province of Azerbaijan, and, if they should be inclined to emigrate into Russia, a period of one year is to be allowed them for the disposal of all moveable property, and a period of five years for the disposal of lands.

"16th. The ratification of this treaty to be exchanged within the space of four months.

The manifesto contains some passages worthy of insertion:-

" It was in the midst of friendly negotiations, and when positive assurances gave us the hope of preserving the relations of good neighbourhood with Persia, that the tranquillity of our people was disturbed on the frontiers of Caucasus, and that a sudden invasion violated the territory of the emperor, in contempt of solemn treaties. It was then necessary to repel force by Obliged to pursue the enemy through a country without roads, laid waste by the troops which were to have defended it-often opposed by nature itselfexposed to the burning sun of summer, and the rigours of winter-our brave army, after unparalleled efforts, succeeded in conquering Erivan, which was reported impregnable. It passed the Araxes, planted its standards on the top of Ararat, and, penetrating further and further into the interior of Persia, it occupied Tabriz itself, with the country depending on it. The Khanate of Erivan, on both sides of the Araxes, and the Khanate of Nakhichevan, a part of the ancient Armenia, fell into the hands of the conquerors.

" Our object was to secure to the empire a natural and strong barrier on the side of Persia; to obtain a complete indemnity for all the losses occasioned by the war, and thus to remove all the causes which might lead to its return.

" For us, one of the principal results of this peace consists in the security which it gives to one part of our frontiers. It is solely solely in this light that we consider the utility of the new countries which Russia has just acquired. Every part of our conquests that did not tend to this end was restored, by our orders, as soon as the conditions of the treaty were published. Other essential advantages result from the stipulations in favour of commerce, the free development of which we have always considered as one of the most influential causes of industry, and, at the same time, as the true guarantee of a solid peace, founded on an entire reciprocity of wants and interests."

Besides the provinces of Erivan and Nakichevan, Russia acquires the salt mines of Knipi, and very extensive commercial advantages. Of the military contributions of eighty millhons of rubles, sixty-four are already paid. The emperor has distributed six millions among the officers who have most distinguished themselves in the Persian war, and Gen. Paskewitsch has received one million for his share, and has been created a count. M. Oberskoff, who negotiated and signed the treaty, has received the grand cross of the order of St. Anne and 300,000 rubles.

China.

THE INSURRECTION.

We have been favoured with advices from China and from the north of India, which concur in stating, that the rebellion in Chinese Tartary has been suppressed by the arms and influence of China. The intelligence from the Himalaya rests upon the authority of letters from Shalkur, which state, that the Chinese had completely beaten the Tartars, many of whom were actually fugitives in Lebdakh, a state. however, that is little likely to afford them an asylum, being itself under the powerful control, although not the absolute dominion of China. The news from China is After three repeated demore detailed. feats by the Chinese, the Tartars were unable to meet them in the field, although the leader, Chang-ke-urh, effected his escape, much to the dissatisfaction of his Imperial Majesty. These successes were followed by the capture of Khoten, and finally of Yarkhend, when eleven leaders of the insurgents were put to death, as victims to the spirits of the Chinese officers who had fallen in the course of the war. The imperial army had thence advanced to Cashghar, from which place accounts, dated 20th July, state it was on its return, after leaving a sufficient force to garrison the Mohammedan cities. The head of the insurrection had effected his retreat into some foreign territory, in a state of utter destitution, and deserted by all his followers. As a mark of the Emperor's generosity, he had remitted the annual contributions from the conquered cities, it is pretended, in consideration of the devastations of the war; but this act of liberality furnishes reason to suppose, that the tranquillization of the Tartars has been effected, as much by concession on the part of the Chinese government, as by the valour of its troops. The re-establishment of Chinese influence along the tract of country from the desert of Kobi to Cashghar, renews a barrier more insurmountable than the peaks of the Himalaya to the progress of civilization and commerce, which, without such interposition, might, at no very distant period, bring into frequent contact the steppes of Tartary and the plains of Hindostan.—Cal. Gov. Gax. Dec. 3.

By letters from Canton, it appears that some disturbance had taken place between the Chinese and the crew of an American vessel, in which a Chinaman had been killed, and the American consul was obliged to quit Canton.

BIRTHS.

July 18. At Macao, the lady of R. Turner, Esq. of a son.
Oct. 3. At Macao, the lady of Capt. G. White, ship Sherburne, of a daughter.

Australasia and Polynesia.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

LAW.

Supreme Court, Sept. 29.—The King, v. Robert Wardell, LL.D. This was a criminal information filed by the Attorney-General against the defendant, as the editor and proprietor of the Australian newspaper, for printing and publishing a seditions libel in that paper, intending to vilify and defame the governor of the colony, on the 3d of August last.

The defendant pleaded not guilty.

The Attorney and Solicitor General, assisted by Mr. Gellibrand, the ex-Attorney-General of Van Diemen's Land, conducted the prosecution. Dr. Wardell defended himself.

The libel was contained in some remarks of the editor of the Australian on a government notice of 30th July last, respecting a decision of the magistrates in regard to assigned servants (see p. 280).

The Attorney-General (Mr. Baxter) stated the case, and contended that the passages, under the pretence of remarking upon an act of the government, taxed the governor with being weak and corrupt. The libel imputed to him, in his official capacity, obstinacy, ignorance, and weakness, and applied rancorous and contemptuous epithets to him. Such publications were calculated to do infinite mischief in such a population as existed in this colony, where where unhappily a spirit of discontent already reigned.

After evidence was given of the pub. lication of the libel, and the application of the terms to General Darling,

Dr. Wardell rose and spoke in his defence at considerable length. He represented that this was only one of many prosecutions which had been instituted against him, not for the sake of correcting the abuses of the press, and upholding the law, but to destroy the freedom of the press. He read the whole of the article out of which the alleged libel had been taken; and, in commenting upon it, as he read, contended that it was a publication which fell within the pale of privileged writing. He cited various law authorities to hear him out in his reasoning. He described the article to be a fair commentary on a government notice which had been published; and that it contained such remarks as the occasion called for. notice, he stated, had appeared after a decision had taken place in the Supreme Court, establishing the rights of individuals over assigned servants, under Mr. Peel's act, and was in direct opposition to that dècision.

· The defendant called one witness who gave it as his opinion that the words "ignorant and obstinate," were not intended to apply to the governor, but prospectively to some future governor.

The Chief Justice left the Jury to decide whether the article was a fair criticism of the government notice, shewing honestly its errors, a subject which a newspaper editor had a right to discuss; or whether it was intended to bring the government into contempt.

The Jury retired about five minutes to three o'clock, and at half past four the foreman returned into court and addressing their honours, said, " please your Honours, we cannot agree in our veidict, nor is there a remote prospect that we shall.'

The Judges having conferred a little while together, suggested to the foreman a reconsideration of the case. Upon which the foreman returned to the room, where the other jurors were waiting to hear the result of this application to the court. About twenty minutes after, the Attorney-general, addressing their Honours, said, that as there appeared to be so much difference of opinion with the Jury, he was induced on the part of the crown to discharge the Jury. He would withdraw the information, and not present any other for the article then before the court.

The defendant consented.

The Jury were sent for. On coming in, the foreman observed that it was impossible for them to agree.

The Chief Justice said, the court regret-ted they could not come to a verdict, and would therefore discharge them.

The court (says the report) was crowded throughout the whole of the day to an extent never before witnessed. Such was the anxiety for the result of this case, that of magistrates there were no fewer than twenty-one present. The respectability and rank of the individuals attending exceeded any thing of the kind ever known in the Supreme Court of this colony.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Colonization .- A letter headed " Colonization in the East," and extracted from The Asiatic Journal,* an English periodical, finds a place in our columns to-day. It possesses great local interest, and is certainly worthy of perusal. It never seems to have been contemplated by the Emigration Committee, or by the English Government, that Canada might some day or other fall into the hands of the Americans, or become a component part of American confederation; or that giving encouragement to emigration in that direction. was helping to raise up in all probability a powerful auxiliary to a country, which is by no means reluctant to enter into hostilities with England upon the slightest cause. The author of the letter in question falls into the common error about prisoners, and seems to treat them rather as burthens to this colony, than the means of facilitating improvement, by increasing the available labour of the colonists. Of the policy of forming new settlements there can be little doubt; but the method hitherto adopted will answer no end, except injuring the colonies of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, and making deductions from their resources, already too limited. There is not at present a single settlement on the coast of New Holland that can be said to be in a flourishing state; and there is not one of them which has not occasioned serious loss to New South Wales. This is a brief but a sure way of trying the merits of new settlements. Let England fit out as many expeditions as she pleases, either for exploring or forming new settlements along the coast; but let her do so independently of our means, and without dipping into our colonial funds, or taking from us useful and indispensable labour. - Australian, October 12.

Lake. - An attempt has recently been made by Mr. Thomas Jamison, and a party, to gain some information respecting the lake or inland sea, to which, as we stated a little while ago, report had given existence, beyond, we believe, Wellington Valley. Mr. Jamison penetrated in a north-westerly direction to a distance of eighty miles beyond Capetey, and there he fell in with some natives, who described this great water, and represented that the party were only two days journey from The waves, the natives said, ere ruffled exactly like the sea; and when it blows hard the water is agitated as much as the extended ocean. From this it may be concluded, that there must be a great expanse of water; and from the representations which have been made, we may also conclude that it is surrounded with land, and has no communication with the The natives informed Mr. Jamison that an animal, as large as a dog, was very commonly seen, and often caught on the banks. The animal, in all probability, is an otter, as it is described to be very fat, and the natives are fond of it as food. It is likely that Mr. Jamison and his party were not in a condition to proceed according to the information given them, as they were so near by accounts as two days' journey to this important discovery. Want of provisions compelled the travellers to return .- Ibid, Aug. 22.

* See vol. xxiii, p. $40.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.

The Press .- The legislative council of this colony have passed an act subjecting publishers of newspapers to the necessity of taking out an annual license; and another act imposing upon newspapers published in the colony a duty of three-pence each, which the existing governor is empowered to reduce at pleasure. The preamble of the former act, amongst other reasons for the measure, contains the following plea, viz.

" And whereas, several matters have been printed and published in newspapers printed and circulated within this island, calculated to diminish the due authority of the government over such transported offenders and over others his Majesty's subjects here resident, and tending to bring the government and the administration of the government, as by law established, into public hatred and contempt;—and the printing and publishing of such matters in such newspapers have, notwithstanding various instances of prosecution and punishment by law, been from time to time continued, to the endangering of the public peace, and the disturbance of the harmony and good order of society."

The object of the duty is alleged in the preamble to be the expediency of providing a fund for defraying the charges of printing public acts, &c. This act is to continue in force for one year, and the lieut .governor is empowered to rescind it, or any part of it, within that period.

These two measures have raised a great ferment and outery in this and the sister colony.

POLYNESIA.

By a recent arrival from the Society Islands, we hear that a revolution, of a religious nature, has lately engaged the attention of the inhabitants of Tahiti. It appears that two native teachers have started up, saying they have been inspired by the Holy Ghost, to teach the Taliteans a new and improved religion, very supenior to the Christian. At any rate it seems more adapted to their sensual understanding than any other; as one church (the Rev. Mr. Darling's) has, we believe, been quite deserted, on account of the great number of converts to the new-fangled doctrines of the reformers. We look with curiosity for the next accounts. - Sydney Paper, Sept. 28.

INDIAN SECURITIES AND EXCHANGES.

Calcutta, Dec. 27, 1827.

Government Securities.

Buy.] Rs. As. Rs. As. [Sell. Prem. 26 0 Remittable Loan 6 per ct. 25 6 Prem. Disc. 0 2 Five per ct. Loan ... 0 6 Disc. Prem. 0 3 New 5 per cent. Loan ... Par Disc. Rates of Exchange, On London, 6 months' sight,—to buy is. 10½d.—to sell 2s. 0½d. per Sicca Rupee. On Madras, 30 days' ditto, 91 to 92 Sicca Rupees per 100 Madras Rupees. On Bombay, ditto, 98 Sicca Rupees per 100 Bombay Rupees. Prem.—to buy 5,200—to sell 5,100.

Madras, Jan. 3, 1828.

Government Securities. Six per cent. Bengal Remittable Loan.  Bombay, Dec. 15, 1827.

Exchange.

On London, at 6 months 'sight, is. 6jd., per Rupee.
On Calcutts, at 30 days' sight, 100 Bom. Rs. per 100 Sicca Rupees.
On Madras, at 30 days' sight, 100 Bom. Re. per 100 Madras Rs.

Singapore, Nov. 17, 1827.

Exchange.

Gov. Bills on Bengal, at 30 days sight, per 100 Sp. Ds., 207 Slc. Rs. Private Bills on ditto—none. Private Bills on London, per Sp. Ds. 45, 2d.

HOME INTELLIGENCE.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

House of Commons, April 18.

New South Wales. — Sir J. Macintosh

resented a petition from the gentry, merhants, traders, and yeomen of New bouth Wales, agreed to at a public mect-ng at Sydney, New South Wales, prayng for popular representation and trial by ury. He should merely state, that acording to the most credible evidence in is possession, the two Australias containd from 55 to 60,000 inhabitants, of whom rom 35 to 40,000 were free settlers; that he annual revenue exceeded £60,000, ind that the annual produce of land and abour (but this was a matter of uncertain and difficult calculation) amounted to £800,000. He knew of no colony where such a number of free British subjects were denied the ancient and immemorial ights of Englishmen. There were un-toubtedly other colonies, where, not the British constitution, but the semblance of it, had been introduced, not to the benefit, but to the detriment, of the inhabitants of those places. There were other possessions,—our Asiatic dominions, for instance,-where circumstances prevailed which perhaps would not allow the introduction of those free institutions.

Mr. Huskisson said, when his right hon, and learned friend was informed that the great majority of persons in New South Wales were free settlers,-that the free settlers were 35,000 or 40,000 in number,-the parties who gave him this information either possessed much better sources of knowledge than his Majesty's government or they themselves were greatly misled. By the last account which he had seen, the population amounted to 49,000: of that number 18,000 were settlers, and the great majority of inhabitants were persons who had forfeited their civil rights,-who had been sent out to New South Wales as a punishment. Now this fact alone must materially influence the determination of the house in deciding whether these colonies were fitted to receive a legislative assembly, and trial by jury. He had many reasons which induced him to think, that instead of imparting a blessing, they would do a great mischief to the colonies, if, prematurely, the boons prayed for were granted to them. As soon as the people were prepared for them, he would willingly give them those privileges, which he wished to see enjoyed by British subjects wherever they were placed.

Mr. Miles O'Reilly.—Sir J. Mackintosh presented a petition from Mr. Miles O'Reilly, of Dublin, complaining of the loss of a large sum of money owing to the misconduct and insolvency of the late Mr. Gilbert Ricketts, the registrar of the Supreme Court of Madras, in which he contended that he had an equitable claim upon the Company for reparation, but which they refused to comply with. the statute of the 39th and 40th of the late king, the registrar of the King's Court was empowered to sue out letters of administration when any person died intestate in the presidency. Col. O'Reilly, the peti-tioner's brother, died in 1816 insolvent, and his personal estate, about £3,000. was taken possession of by the registrar and lodged in the Company's treasury. Mr. Ricketts, being embarrassed, took this money from the treasury, without any rule or order of the court, and dying insolvent, the money was not recoverable. Sir T. Strange and Sir E. Stanley, two of the judges of the court, had declared that the Company were responsible, and he (Sir J. M.) thought that but reasonable. Yet they refused to replace the

Mr. Denison mentioned a similar case of a Mr. Sinclair, who had lost 10,000 pagodas in the same manner, by the insolvency of Mr. Ricketts. In his opinion, the persons concerned in these two cases had, by every consideration of law, equity, and liberality, a claim upon the East-India Company.

Mr. C. W. W. Wynn felt it his duty to say, that this was a case of great magnitude and importance. He believed that the deficiencies of Mr. Ricketts amounted to no less a sum than £40,000, which had been abstracted from the property of the widows and children of the persons whose effects Mr. Ricketts had, as registrar, administered. The subject was one of great difficulty, and he hardly knew on whom the claim for redress should be made. By the act of 1800, which had been brought forward by government, and not at the motion of the Company, it was enacted that, as persons in India had commonly few relatives who could undertake the administration of their effects, that office should devolve on a public officer, and the duty was thrown upon the registrar. The judges naturally appointed the existing officer of the recorder's court. He could not help regretting that when this duty was put upon the registrar, the judges did not take an adequate pecuniary security from him. (hear!) The practice now was, that the registrar gave such security, and that no money should be drawn out of the treasury without an order of court. But now came the question-who was to make the loss good?

If. a similar case having happened in this country, the government would have had to redress the injured party; then, indeed, he thought the petitioner must be re-dressed by the East-India Company. If not, he did not think the petitioner had any claim on the Company. not a question of liberality. This was Unless a sufficient case were made out, the East-India Company could not, consistently with the discharge of their duty, reimburse the petitioner.

LAW.

PRIVY COUNCIL, February 23.

John D. White, appellant, Patrick Cleg-horn, respondent. This was originally a suit instituted in the Supreme Court of Madras, arising out of the insolvency of Mr. Ricketts, registrar of that court. the day previous to his decease, which happened on the 4th December 1817, Mr. Ricketts delivered to the appellant, his son-in-law, three scaled packets, directed to three individuals, with a letter addressed to the appellant, wherein he requested him to deliver the packets as directed. Mr. Ricketts died suddenly of apoplexy, intestate, leaving a widow and children. The appellant delivered the packets as directed, on the 6th December, to Mr. Shaw, who succeeded Mr. Ricketts as registrar, administered his estate and effects, with the cognizance of the delivery of the packets aforesaid, Mr. Shaw died on the 4th September 1819, and no letters of administration of Mr. Ricketts' estate were subsequently granted, so that the estate was without representation. On the death of Mr. Shaw the respondent was appointed registrar, and in March 1820 he filed a bill against the appellant, imputing to him various acts of fraud and misconduct in the affairs of Mr. Ricketts, which bill was subsequently amended, and then charged that the appellant, at the time of Mr. Ricketts' death, had in his possession certain packets which he knew contained security for money, which, with a fraudulent intention, he delivered to certain persons. The bill was finally amended, by the omission of various offensive imputations, and prayed for an account of all monies or securities received by the appellant, or by Harriett Ricketts, or by any other persons, with the privity of the appellant, in connexion with Mr. Ricketts' estate. appellant, in his answer, denied all the fraud imputed to him, as well as a knowledge of the contents of the packets, or that they contained property at the time he delivered them. The cause was heard before the Supreme Court at Madras in March 1822, and on the 3d June 1822 it was decreed that the property contained in two of the packets delivered as aforesaid, was part of the assets of Mr. Ricketts' estate at the time of his death; that the respondent, as administrator, was entitled thereto: and that the appellant, having disposed of the said assets without lawful authority, with full notice of the embarrassed state of Mr. Ricketts' affairs, and of his deficiencies as a public officer, and other circumstances admitted in the appellant's answers, was personally responsible for those assets, to the amount of 10,000 pagodas, with interest and costs. From this decree and the final decretal order of 29th March 1823, the appellant lodged an appeal to his Majesty in council, which was entered 31st August 1824.

Their lordships decided that the respondent (Cleghorn) not being the legal administrator of Gilbert Ricketts, deceased, the decrees of the Supreme Court at Madras of 3d June 1822 and 29th March 1823 should be reversed, and that the bill of complaint filed by the respondent should stand dismissed.

April 26.

Rance Scragaumy Nauchier, appellant; Sreemathoo Heraneya Garbha Ravacoola Mootoo Vijia Raghoonadha Setuputty, respondent. This is the celebrated Ramnad case. It came before this court on an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court at Madras, in a suit brought by appeal from the Sudder Adawlut, which was lodged here the 19th August 1825. The question arose out of a dispute respecting the right of succession to the zemindary of Ramnad.

As the case is important, the details long and intricate, and we have not time or space at present to develope them, we propose to give a full report of the case next

Their lordships confirmed the decree of the court below.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ELECTION OF DIRECTORS.

A ballot was taken at the East-India House on the 9th April, for the election of six Directors, in the room of the Hon. H. Lindsay, J. Morris, Esq., R. Campbell, Esq., J. G. Ravenshaw, Esq., J. Du Pre Alexander, Esq., and N. B. Edmonstone, Esq., who go out by rotation. At six o'clock the glasses were closed and delivered to the scrutineers, who reported that the election had fallen on H. Alexander, Esq., W. S. Clarke, Esq., R. C. Plowden, Esq., G. Raikes, Esq., Sir George Abercrombie Robinson, and J. Thornhill, Esq.—Same day, a Court of Directors was held, when the thanks of the court were voted unanimously to the Hon. Hugh Lindsay, chairman, and James Pattison, Esq., deputy-chairman, for their zeal and attention to the Company's interest during the last year.

On the 10th a Court of Directors was held held, when the new directors took the ouths and their seats; and Win. Astell, Esq. and John Loch, Esq. were chosen chairman and deputy-chairman for the vear ensuing.

SCOTS' CHURCH IN INDIA.

The subscription in India to the General Assembly's fund, for the appointment of missionaries in connexion with the church of Scotland to the East, has been very successful, £1,000 having been lodged in a bank to the credit of the Assembly's committee; and Dr. Bryce, and a few other Scots gentlemen at Calcutta, had obtained, in a few days, betwixt £300 and £400 in aid of the subscription for the High School of this city .- Edinburgh Paper.

PROMOTIONS AND CHANGES IN THE BRITISH ARMY.

(SERVING IN THE EAST.)

3d Foot. Maj. R. J. Maclean, from h. p. to be maj., paying dif., v. Gillman, app. to 69th F. (20 Mar. 28).

(20) Mar. 28).

16th Foot, Brev. Lieut. Col. H. Bird to be lieut. col.; Brev. Maj. T. D. Turner to be lieut. col., v. Bird; and Lieut. J. Brand to be capt., v. Turner to lieut. col., v. Bird; and Lieut. J. Brand to be capt., v. Turner to be lieut.; 28).—Lieut. H. Strode, from 31st. F., to be lieut.; Lieut. P. Macfariane from h. p. 91st. f. to be lieut.; Lieut. D. Deakins, from Ceylon regt. to be lieut.; Lieut. D. Deakins, from Ceylon regt. to be lieut.; Ens. W. Bell, from 83d F. to be lieut.; Ens. W. Bell, from 63d F. to be lieut.; Ens. E. C. Hudson, from 17th F. to be lieut.; and Ens. W. Foley, from 63th F. to be lieut.; and Ens. W. Foley, from 65th F. to be lieut.; and Ens. W. Foley, from 65th F. to be lieut.; and Ens. W. Foley, from 65th F. to be lieut.; Ens. C. Purdon; D. M. Cameron to be Ens., v. Hannagan, prom. in 20th F. (28 Apr.)

31st Foot. Ens. C. Purdore to be lieut., v.

v. Hannagan, prom. in 26th F. (26 Apr.)
31st Foot. Ens. C. Prunrose to be licut., v.
Oleary, app. adj. (13 Sept. 26); Ens. G. F. White to be licut., v. Douglas dec. (3 Apr. 29); Arch.
Dickson to be ens., v. Prinrose, piom. (2 Apr.);
T. C. Kelly to be ens., v. White (3d Apr.)
46th Foot. Capt. C. S. O'Meara, from h. p. 31st
F., to be capt., v. Sir John Lille, who exch. (27th
Mar. 28)

54th Foot. Lieut. Thos. Kennedy to be capt. by purch., v. Kelly, who rets. (27th Mar. 28); Eas. J. Mellis, from 66th F., to be heut. by purch., v. Kennedy prom. (3d Apr.)

57th Foot. Lieut. Col. James Allan, from h.p., to be lieut. col., v. Cathcart, app. to 8th F. (20th Mar. 28.(

83d Foot. C. T. Egerton to be Ens., v. Bell, prom. in 16th F. (26th Apr. 28.)

INDIA SHIPPING.

Arrivals.

Aprol. General Kyd., Nairne, and Hythe, Wilson, both from China 30th Nov.; at a Deal.—2. Wittenon, Manning, from China 5th Dec.; off Yorking, Manning, from China 5th Dec.; off The China 5th Dec.; off Dover.—7. Elizabeth, Athenden, from N. S. Wales 1th Nov., at Deal.—8. Pauchape, Chinstee, from Maunitius 28th Nov., and Cape of Good Hope 6th Jan.; at Gravesend.—9. H. M. S. Samarana, Dunn, from Cape of Good Hope 6th Jan.; at Gravesend.—9. H. M. S. Samarana, Dunn, from Cape of Good Hope 5th Feb.; at Portsmouth.—10. Charles Grant, Hay, from China 5th Dec., and Cape of Good Hope 5th Feb.; at Portsmouth.—10. Charles Grant, Hay, from China 5th Dec., at Cowes-Money, from Butwal 30th Nov. (from Amsterdam); off the Start.—Sir William Wallace, Brown, from Bombay 25th Nov.; off Portsmouth.—Washington, Salisbury, from China 5th Dec.; at Cowes-Money, off Dover.—12. John Taglor, Alkinson, from Bengal 28th Nov., at Liverpool.—Marquas of Hastings, Diake, foun China 1st Doc.; at Gravesend.—Dauson, Dawson, from the Mauritius 21st Dec; at ditto.—Trusts, Cobb, from the Cape of Good Hope 22th Jan; at ditto.—Gulfyned, Johnson, from Chiak Ir. Dec; at Deal.—13. Katharine Stewart Flybas, Chapman, from Bombay 7th Dec; off Maragate.—So. muel Brown, Reed, from the Mauritius lith Jan; off Ramagate.—14. Bombay, Charlite, from China 25th Nov.; at Gravesend.—Bolton, Clark, from Bombay 28th Nov.; off Portsmouth.—Dorothy, Garnock, from Bombay 28th Nov.; for Portsmouth.—Dorothy, Garnock, from Bombay 28th Dec; at Liverpool.—John Heyes. Worthington, from Bengal 28th Nov., and Cape of Good Hope 19th Feb; at Liverpool.—Harriet. Palmer, from Mauritius 9th Jan., and Cape of Good Hope 19th Feb; at Liverpool.—Vallant, Bragg, from Mauritius 15th Dec; at Deal.—Morning Star, Bushey, from Caylon 12th Dec, and Cape of Good Hope 28th Jan.; at Deal.—17. City of Ethiburgh, W. Kellar, from Mauritius 14th Jan; at Gravesend.—Novod, Conbro, from Mauritius 6th Jan; at Gravesend.—Novod, Conbro, from Mauritius 6th Jan; at Gravesend.—Cape of Good Hope 12th Jan.; at Deal.—20. Curibbra Caulte, Davey, from Bengal 30th Dec, Madras 9th Jan, and Cape of Good Hope 27th Feb; off Portsmouth.—21. Manilas, Johnstone, from Singaporo 17th Dec; at Deal.—Aimon Marin, Graut, from Mauritius 13th Jan, at Deal.—22. Jewie, Bong, from Bengal 14th Dec; at Leage, Lus, from V. D. Land 18th Jan., at Deal.—20. Crists, Peabody, from Bengal 14th Dec; at Liverpool.—24. Syrondoll, Dunning, from Mauritius 14th Dec; at Gravesend.

Dopartives.

24. Stronebull, Dunning, from Mauritius 14th Dec; at Gravesend!

Murch 23. Civilian, Blair, for N. S. Wales; from Cove of Cork.—26. City of Aberdeen, Duthle, for Bengul; from Greenock.— Murv Hinge, Farmer, for Cape of Good Hope and N. S. Wales, from Liverpool.—24. Ren had, Potter, for Batavia and Singapore; from Liverpool.—26. Ren had, Potter, for Batavia and Singapore; from Liverpool.—26. Ren had, Potter, for Batavia and Singapore; from Declaration of the Aberta and Singapore; both from Peal.—February Banny, for Cape of Good Hope and Mauritins; from Portsmouth.—April 2. Victory, Farmer, Bunny, for Cape of Good Hope, Madras, and Bengal; from Portsmouth.—J. Camet, Barnes, for Mauritus; from Liverpool.—4. Reput, Huntley, for Bengal; from Liverpool.—6. Cevlon, Davison, for Ceylon; from Deal.—Hiberts, Marley, for Bonbay; from Deal.—In Strom Shereness.—12. Madeline, Coghlan, for Manilla; from Deal.—16. Ciyde, Scott, for Bombay; from Shereness.—12. Madeline, Coghlan, for Manilla; from Deal.—Buttanny, Hudge, for N. S. Wales; from Deal.—10. Strom Liverpool.—17. Palanbom, Nah, for Bornby; from Greenock.—18. Lanach, Noakes, for Bengal; from Deal.—Buttanny, Hudge, for N. S. Wales; from Deal.—Buttanny, Hudge, for N. S. Wales; from Deal.—Planer, Pope, from Madras and Bengal; from Deal.—Buttanny, Hudge, for N. S. Wales; from Deal.—21. Dout, Free, for N. S. Wales; from Deal.—21.

PASSENGERS FROM INDIA.

Per Genaul Knl., from China; Mrs. Hetzler and servant, from Bengal; Surg. G. Klng, R.N.; Mr. C. Slater, from Madras; Mr. W. B. Leggett, from Sr. Helena.

Per Hythe, from China: Mrs. Pringle; two Per Highe, 1000 China: Mist Faren; three servants.

Per Waterloo, from China: Master G. Armstrong; Serj. T. Smith, wife, and four children; several soldiers.

several soulers.

Per Bilom, from Bombay: Mrs. Warden; Mrs. Bruce; Mrs. Whitehill; Mrs. Hunt; Miss Kenispton; Sir Ralph Rice; Mr. Chas. Grant; Rev. C. Jeaffreson, Madras estab; Col. Podmore, ditto; C. Jeaffreson, ditto; Lieut, Wright, Bengal estab; two Misses Bruce; two Misses Simson; Misses J. Whitehall and C. Hunt; Masters Grant, Warrington, and Bruce; sevoral servants.

Per Erzabeth, from N. S. Wales: Mr. R. W. Loun; Mr. Roberts; Dr. MacTurnon, R.N.; Dr. Ree, R.N.; Mr. Hutchinson; Mr. Roberts, jun.; Mr. Blacksland.

Pr Charles Grant, from China: W. S. Con-nolly, Esq., Bengal service; Licut. Gen. Sir Thos Brown

Brown, H. C'a service; D. M. Percival, Eaq.; Mrs., Percival; Mr. A. Mortis, late first mate of the Association, L. Daniall, H. M. 98th Foot, Lieux, 65, 6apt, Cape Cavairy; Lieux E. R. Rumille, H. M. Schip, Foot, Lieux, M. H. M. 49th regit, Mrs. Rundle and two childes II. M. edw. hill de Grant Germine, S. Sir Rich. Plaskett; dem (overnite) three servants.

hree strongs, from China, &c. Count K. S. W. pe Hogen, Countess De Hogen, six children, and three strongs, from Batavia; Capt. A. C. Maclean; Mr. Ormsby, from Madras; Claude Quiros, Esq., from Singapoor.

from Singapour.

Per Katharine Stewart Forbes, from Bombay:
Colouel and Mrs. Meall; Lisut. Col. Brown; Macolouel and Mrs. Meall; Lisut. Col. Brown; Macolouel and Mrs. Meall; Lisut. Forbidished to pirath, and Mcann; Dr. Turbull; Mades estab;
Mrs. Keys; Master Keys; Miss Rowe; four serserMrs. Keys; Master Keys; Miss Rowe; four sercants

Per Guildford, from China: D. B. Conway, esq.,

Per Sir William Wallis, from Rombay: Col. Drummond; Mr. J. MacMorris; Mr. J. Anderson; Mrs. Caldecott.

Pr. Dorothy, from Bombay; Maj. Brown, H.M. 4th L. Drags.; Mrs. Brown; Mrs. Blrd; Lleut. (contor, 11. M. 6th Foot; Lleut. Raltt, Queen's Royals, Mr. C. Downey.

Per City of Edinburgh, from Mauritius: Col. Linksay, E. Hirondell, Esq.; Mrs. Eaton.

Linkay E. Hirondell, Esq.; Mrs. Eaton.

Pr. Cewer, From Bengal: C. Smith, Esq., Bengrey C. Lieut, Col. Lindsay; Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mrs. Lindsay;
Mr

Per John Taylor, from Bengal: Mr. Jas. Hutton. Per John Heyes, from Bengal: Mr. John Tur-ner; Master Turner; Capt. Woodman.

Per Bengal, from Calcutta: Mr. W. Webb; Mr. B. Vincent, H. M's. 49th regt.; Miss Hogg, from the Cape.

Pr. Lang, from V. D. Land; Mr. E. Nicholas; Mr. G. W. Bernard; Mr. H. Schultz; Mr. Jas. Wood; Mr. Symons; Mrs. Symons; Mr. D. Carter, walow of Capt. Carter, late of the Waterloo.

rece, wildow of Capt. Carter, is the of the Waterloo.

Per tambrea Cratle, from Bengal: Mrs. Dick,

Wis. Burton, wife of Dr. Burton, from Madras,

Mrs. Brock, wife of Maj. Brock, from the Cape;

Elw. Powney, Esti., Madras C. S.; Lieut. Col.

Alex. Fair, 51st Madras N. I.; Maj. H. Ross, 42d dito; Maj. Alex. M'Latern, 51st ditto; Maj. S.

Brock, H. M. 55th regt., from the Cape; J. Burton, Eaq. 29th Madras N. I., gar. surg. Bellay;

(apt. W. Cunnlingham, 54th dengal N. I.; Capt.

T. Polwhele, 4lst ditto; Lieut. Thos. Presely,

51st dito; Lieut. John Milner, 9th Bengal L. C.;

Mr. C. Feldwick, Ordanare Department Lieut.

E.G. Stoker, H. M. 13th L. Drags; Lieut. A. Erskine,

Il. M. 38th regt.; Lieut. J. C. Everard, H. M. 15th

L. Drags; Mr. Tapley, late chief office of the Bige. Mr. Hill, second officer of ditto; two

Miss. Templers, from Calcuta; Miss Godfrey, and two Misses Burton, from Madras; several setvant.

Per Crisis, from Bengal; Mr. Alex. Daley; Mrs. Daley; three Misses Daley.

Per Buckinghamshire, from China, &c.; John Prince, Esq., President of Singapore; P. V. Lindsy, Esq., Bengal C. S., and lady; Miss E. Abbut; C. MacLeod, Esq.; H. T. Goode, Esq.; Lieut. B. Mortimer, Madras artillery.

PASSENGERS TO INDIA.

PASSENGERS TO INDIA.

Por Boyne, for Madras and Bengal: Dr. Currle and two daughters; Maj. Huy: Capt. Gordon:
Leut. Sweeli; Dr. Fultan; Mr. Lautrie; Dr.
Gob; Mr. Gibb; Rev. Mr. Adam; Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Smith; Mr. and Mrs. Cumberland; Mr.
Vates, Cadet; Capt. Gill; Mr. Loveday; Mr. Erkine: Miss How: Mr. and Mrs. Harewood; Mr.
Church, Cadet: Mr. Golding; Dr. Eaton; Mr.
Bidelulph; Master Currle; Mr. McLeod; five tacrage passengers, and Maria Wolf, a female servant. seri ant.

Per Hibberts, for Bombay : Mr. Hancock

Per Magnet, for V. D. Land and N. S. Wales: Mr. J. E. Stacey, Mrs. Stacey, and one child; Mr. B. Stacey, Mrs. Stacey, and four children; Mr.

J. Swalne; thirteen steerage passengers; several children of ditto.

Per Ganges, for Madras and Bengal; Mr. Su-therland and family; Mr. and Miss Trall; three Miss Neales; Rev. Mr. Efeson and lady; Mr. Friend; Mrs. Baker and family; Dr. and Mrs. Steel; Mrs. Hard; Mr. Bissett, Cadet; several Steel;

Per Vesper, for Madras and Bengal: Lieut. Pope; Mrs. Pope; Mr. Kingston; Mrs. Kng-ston; Chas. Haggart; Robert Muuro; Mr. Speet; Assist. Surg. Astley Cooper Spurgen; and several

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

March 21. At St. Andrew's, the lady of G Playfair, Esq., Hon. E. I. Company's service, of a son. 30. At Ceel Lodge, Cheshuat, Herts, the lady of Colonel Osborne, of a daughter.

April 9. In Devonshire Place, the lady of Money Wigram, Esq., of a son.

MARRIAGES.

MARRIAGES.

March 28. At Bromley, Kent, R. S. Battiscombe, Esq. M. A., Fellow of King's-college, Cambridge, to Eliza Rachel Alicia, only daughter of the late Percival Potts, Esq., of the Bengal civil service. 29. At Melisham, Colonel C. S. Fagan, C. B., of the Bengal army, to Elizabeth Jane, third daughter of Geo. Moule, Esq., of Melisham, April 7. At Edinburgh, R. Strachan, Esq., distiller, Leith, to Margaret, only daughter of the late Arch. Burnett, Esq., Calcutta.

At St. Mary's Church, Marylebone, Lleut. Col. Win. Farquhar, Hon. E. 1. Company's service, to Margaret, daughter of Robert Loban, Esq. Kingston, N. B. 10. At Gedling, Nottinghamshire, Lleut. Col. H. Huthwate, of the Bengal army, to Miss Anne Elizabeth Beaumont, neice of the Rev. T. Beaumont, of Bridgeford Hill, 18 the same county. 12. At Linton, Kent, C. W. Martin, Esq., eldest son of F. W. Martin, Esq. of Leeds Castle, Kent, to the Lady Jeminua isabella Mann, only daughter of the Earl Cornwallis.

14. At St. Pancras Church, T. E. Poole, Esq. of Queen's College, Oxford, eldest son of the late Leut. Col. T. Poole, of the Hon. E. I. Company's service, to Caroline, only daughter of the late Chas. Stephens, Esq. of Devonshire.

22. Mr. Jos. Lachlan, Jun. of Great Alie Street, to Mary Ellis, eldest daughter of the late Chas. Stephens, Esq. of Devonshire.

23. Mr. Jos. Lachlan, Jun. of Great Alie Street, to Mary Ellis, eldest daughter of the late Mrs. R. Michod, Hon. E. I. Company's service.

Jately, At Warblington, Sir Geo. Garrett, of Gatcombe House, near Portsmouth, to Ms. Pearce, widow of T. Pearce, Esq., Hon. E. I. Company's anval service.

— At Canterbury, Kent, J. A. R. Jones, second

— At Canterbury, Kent, J. A. R. Jones, second son of J. R. Jones, of Brussels, coach-builder, to Isabella, only daughter of the late S. Nicholls, Esq., of Calcutta.

DEATHS.

March 15. At Bruges, Benj. Sydenham, Esq., in his 52d year, eldest son of the late Gen. Syden-ham.

April 1. In Portland Place, Charles Law, Esq., of the Bombay civil service.

4. Drowned, in Margate Roads, Henry Stringer, midshipman of the H. C. ship Waterloo, second son of J. L. Stringer, Esq., Effingham-hill,

6. At Kilmarnock, Capt. R. Crawford, late a commander in the Bengal flotilla during the Bur-commander in the Bengal flottilla during the Burnese war.

18. In Bloombury-square, aged 63, the Hon. John Herbert Harington, late senior member of the supreme ('ouncil, Bengal. 16. At Edihburgh, Patrick, second son of the late Capt. Patrick Hunter, of the Hon. E. I. Company's service.

13. At Worcrester, Arabella, widow of the Rev. Thos. James, D. D., formerly head maxer of Rugby, and Prebendary of Worcester, and mother of the Bishop of Calcutts.

19. At Bath, Georgiana, wife of Henry Blair, Esq., of the Madras civil service.

20. Bonne, Infrait daughter of Capt. J. P. Wilson, of the H. C. ship Hythe, aged 13 months.

21. Henry Heberden, fourth son of Dr. Heberden, Pall-Mall, in his 28th year.

GOODS DECLARED FOR SALE AT THE EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

For Sale 13 May-Prompt 8 August. Company's.—Saltpetre.

Licensed.—Cloves-Sago—Cassia Lignes.
For Sale 15 May-Prompt 8 August.

Licensed.—Senna—Gamboge—Gum Ammoniac Benjamin—Bees'-Wax—Croton Oil.

For Sale 16 May—Prompt 8 August.

Licensed. — Gum Arabic — Gum Senega — Gall Nuts.

For Sale 21 May—Prompt 8 August.

Licensed.—Tortoiseshell — Elephants' Teeth —
Paddy Bird Feathers — White Feathers — Grey Feathers.

For Sale 2 June-Prompt 29 August.

Tea. - Bohea, 1,150,000 lb.; Congou, Campoi.

Pekoe, and Southong, 5,800,000 lb.; Twanksy and Hyson-Skin, 1,000,000 lb.; Hyson, 250,000 lb. Total, including Private-Trade, 7,709,000 lb.

For Sale 10 June-Prompt 5 September. Company's-Bengal and Coast Place Goods. For Sale 23 June-Prompt 10 October. Company's.—Bengal Raw Silk.

CARGOES of EAST-INDIA COM-PANY'S SHIPS lately arrived.

CARGOES of the Waterloo, Hythe, General Kyd Charles Grant, Bombay, Marquis of Hastings and Guildford, from China; and the Cases, from Bengal.

Trom Bengui.

Company's.—Tea—Sugar.

Private-Trade and Privilege.—Tea—Raw Silk—Wrought Silks — Nankeens—Rhubarb—Tortolse.

shell—Coral Counters—Vermillion—Papers—Bamboos—Madeira—Sherry.

UNITED COMPANY OF MERCHANTS OF ENGLAND, mer Bedford Place, Russell Square George Raikes, Esq. St. James's Street Charles Elton Prescott, Esq. 34, Charles Street, Berkeley Square. Whitehall B. M. P. 13, York Street, Portman Square. Bloomsbury. M. Asrell, Esq. (Chairman), M.P. 4, Portland Place. Sir George Abercrombie Robinson, Bart. 73, Pall Mall. William Wigram, Esq. M.P., 50, Upper Harley Street. John Masterman, Esq. Nicholas Lane, Lombard Street. Sir R. T. Farquhar, Bart. M.P. 2, Richmond Terrace, Campbell Marjoribanks, Esq. 3, Upper Wimpole Street. Richard Chicheley Plowden, Esq. 8, Devonshire Place TRADING TO THE EAST-INDIES, Upper Harley Street. List of the Directors Upper Harley Street ohn Petty Muspratt, Esq. 94 New Broad Street. ohn Baillie, Esq. M.P. 9, Dewnshire Place. Southampton Row, FOR THE YEAR 1828. Cornwall Terrace. Charles Mills, Esq. 29, New Norfolk Street. Sweny Toone, Esq. 44, Mortimer Street. John Bebb, Esq. 13, Gloucester Place. William Stanley Clarke, Esq. Elm. ames Stuart, Esq. M.P. 63, Henry St. George Tucker, James Pattison. Esq. 37, Lushington, Esq. C. Esq. 8, John Thornhill, Ј. Госн, Henry James ----T'ensury. ·Suiddiys Private Trade. MS W Military Seminary. wanteny Fund. ***** Labrary 1111111111 Law Suits. *. 8noH -----Correspondence. 00000000 5 5 5 5 5 5 5 5 5 5 Craft College. Buying and Warehouses. BW BW BW BW BW *82UnoooV * * * * 44001-0--004--8018840184-4 Years to serve. THE FOLLOWING GENTLEMEN ARE OUT BY ROTATION:

N. B. Edmonstone, Esq. 49, Portland Place. Josias Du Pré Alexander, Esq. 7, Grosvenor Square.

Robert Campbell, Esq. 5, Argyll Place, Argyll Street. Hon. Hugh Lindsay, M. P. 22, Berkeley Square. John Morris, Esq. 21, Baker Street.

John Goldsborough Ravenshaw, Esq. 9, Lower Berkeley Street.

| Down                                                              | 8 1828 | -                                                                                                                                                 | 4                                                                               |                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | $ 8                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | e 1                                                                                                             | 8                                                        | TO Men                                                                                                      |                 | $$                      | -                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | -                     | &gt;                                                      | , |   |   |          |   |     | - |           | _ |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------|-------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------|---|---|---|----------|---|-----|---|-----------|---|
| od o'T                                                            | 88     |                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                 | 8                             | 1828.1Jan. 6Feb.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | ;                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 7.700                                                                                                           |                                                          | 7 Mar.                                                                                                      |                 | 210                           | 80.4                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 7                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                       | 1874                                                             | _ |   |   |          |   |     |   |           |   |
| TosailGraveend.                                           | 1827.  | 19Nov 3Dec.                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                 | 3Dec. 18 do.                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 888                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 1000                                                                                                            |                                                          | 31 do.                                                                                                      |                 | 1Feb. 15Feb. 21 day.          | 1Mar. 15Mar 20Apr.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 3) Mary Steam                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                       | 14.Apr.                                                          |   |   |   |          |   |     |   |           | - |
| To beAftoat.                                                  | 1827.  | Vol 4                                                                                                                                             | _                                                                               | 3Dec                          | 18 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | _                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 1888                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                 |                                                   | 16 do.                                                                                                      |                 | Feb.                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 15 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                       | 31 do. 14Apr. 18 May                                             |   |   |   |          |   | •   |   |           | • |
| Consignments                                                      |        | Bombay & China                                                                                                                                    | gal, & China                                                                    | Bengal & China                | Bengal & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Bombay & China                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Bengal & China                                                                                                  | St. Helena, Bom-                                         |                                                                                                             | Maaras & China  | Sauritius & China             | China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | Moderate Bennet                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | manage to some manage | Bengal                                                           |   | • |   |          |   |     |   |           | - |
| Pursers.                                                          | :      | John Shute James Rickett R. Buckle J. K. Jolly Francis Burinij. Giles T. Buttanshaw D. Marshall Geo. Waller A. Tomlins Robt. Harvey W.J. Shepherd | J. H. Lanyon                                                                    | W. Maltman                    | John Lenox                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | C. Udale Jas. Grant W. Spawforth C. Welstead Rich. H. Cox W. Dickinson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Wm. Dallas                                                                                                                                                                                                             | Wm. Ainslie                                                                                                     | Thos. Cron T.Collingwood                                 | J. Walkinshaw                                                                                               | C. S. Compton   | John Mann                     | R. Dudgeon.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | Alex. Crowe                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | John Milroy.          | W. I. Irwin                                                      |   |   |   | · motion |   |     | - |           | • |
| Surgeons.                                                         |        | Francis BuringRobt, Harvey                                                                                                                    | G. Braithwaice Henry Burn Jas. M. Baird Thos. N. Were John Millard J. H. Lanyon | Jas. BeveridgeDavid Scott | Alex. StirlingT. Davidson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Jas. GrantRich. H. Cox                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | W. Hitchcock                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Henry Arnot                                                                                                     | Thos. Cron                                               | Alex. Macrae                                                                                                | Geo. Comb.      | J. Campbell                   | D. T. Roy                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Charles Jones W. Bremner W. M. KilliganF. Shaw R. Greig Alex. Crowe                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Wm. Cook              | Wm. Scott · · · Honey MuletR. Renwick · · W. I. Irwin · ·    |   |   |   | -        | - | *** |   | ****      | • |
| FourthOfficers.                                                   |        | J. K. JollyA. Tomlins                                                                                                                         | Thos. N.Were                                                                    | R. Saunders.                  | A. MacqueenH. Dalrymple                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | C. UdaleC. Welstead                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | W. Pitcaim                                                                                                                                                                                                             | E. Dupuis                                                                                                       | John Willie                                              | Chas. Ray                                                                                                   | J. H. Thorn     | R. Howard                     | J. G. F. PigottJas. Jameson (                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Charles JonesF. Shaw                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | D. Runkin             | PenruddockeG. Abbott                                         | - | - | • |          |   |     |   |           | - |
| First Officers. Second Officers. Third Officers. Fourth Officers. |        | R. BuckleGeo. Walker                                                                                                                          | Jas. M. Baird                                                                   | D. Robertson                  | A PCostobadieJ.W. Edmonds                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Samuel HydeGeo, Steward                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | H. Shepherd                                                                                                                                                                                                            | Boulter J. Bell                                                                                                 | H. J. Wolfe.                                             | John Pitcairn                                                                                               | R. Burroughes   | J. Dalrymple                  | G. Creighton O. Richardson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | J. R. PiddingG. M. Abbott                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Chas. White.          | Edward Voss                                                      |   |   | • |          | - |     |   |           | - |
| Second Officers.                                                  |        | James RickettD. Marshall                                                                                                                      | Henry Burn                                                                      | J. Elphinstone                | R. Tabor                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | CW LoveridgeThos. Sandys                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Geo. Frampton                                                                                                                                                                                                          | J. P. Griffiths                                                                                                 | John Fenn                                                | F. Macqueen                                                                                                 | T.W. Marriott   | Henry Wise                    | A. BroadhurstW.K.Packman                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | R. M. Isacke                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | I. A. Senhouse        | M. Murray                                                        |   |   |   |          |   |     | - | •         | - |
| First Officers.                                                   |        | John Shute                                                                                                                                        | G. Braithwaite                                                                  | W. Drayner                    | Thos. Leach                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | Edw. Jacob                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Jas. S. Biles                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Rees Thomas                                                                                                     | Wm. Fulnam                                               | James Sexton                                                                                                | Geo. Deudney    | G. C. Kennedy                 | T. B. Penfold                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Jas. Wilson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | Wm. Margine           | W.F. HopkinsRobt, Pitcher                                    |   |   |   |          |   |     |   |           | _ |
| Commanders.                                                       |        | M. HamiltonHenry Bax .                                                                                                                        | Joseph Stanton                                                                  | Alex. Chrystie.               | 1372 Oseph Hare J. C. M. Taggart W. Refultst D. J. Hau John Lenox 1879 July John Lenox 1879 July Harbert - The Fraser - The Learn T. Rabor - The Cockbodie A. Macqueen Alex. Stirling John Lenox 1898 S. Marian Land M. Land | Chas. S. Timins                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 130) W. F. Fetters L. at John Innes Jas. S. Blies. Geo. Franțion H. Shepherd . W. Pitcaim W. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas 130 H. Banham John Innes Jas. S. Blies. Geo. Franțion H. Shepherd W. Pitcaim W. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas | 1417 Company's Ship B. Broughton Rees Thomas J. P. Griffiths Boulter J. Bell E. Dupuis Henry Arnot. Wm. Ainslie | T 1 orbins W. Haylet Lohn Fem. H. J. Wolfer. John Willie | 133 John Campbell Lames Walker . James Sexton F. Macqueen John Pitcaun Chas. Ray Alex. Macrae J. Walkinshaw | Thomas Blair    | Thomas Dunkin                 | 1326 Company's Sup Philip BaylisT. B. Penfold A. Broadhurst G. Creipton J. G. F. Picott F. Kleiba F. Beveurge 1326 Company's Sup Philip Baylis F. B. Penfold M. R. Broadhurst G. Creipton J. G. F. Picott F. Kleiba F. Beveurge 1326 Company's Sup I Trunchts Suith A. Bivers M. K. Packman O. Richattson Jas. Jameson .03. T. Roy R. Dudgeon F. B. D. M. R. B. B. P. B. | 1335 Matthew Isacke W. E. Farrer - 1328, Wilson - R. M. Isacke - J. R. Pidolin Charles Jones W. Brienner W. M. Kunigan1826 Matthew Isacke W. E. Farrer - 1328, Wilson - R. M. Isacke - J. R. Pidolin Charles Jones W. Brienner W. M. Kunigan1827 March Programmer B. H. Trabarre, Harris G. M. Abdolf, F. Shaw | The Margine           | 955 O. Wigram C. E. Balderston Rob. Pitcher J. Miller J. Copling |   |   |   |          |   |     |   | mak etker |   |
| ManagingOwners.                                               |        | 1325 G. Palmer                                                                                                                                    | 1283 James Sims                                                                 | S. Marjoribanks               | J. Mac TaggartS. Marion harb                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | John F. Timins                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | H. Bonham                                                                                                                                                                                                              | Company's Ship                                                                                                  | Company's Sap                                            | John Campbell                                                                                               | Joseph Hare     | H. Blansnard J. H. Gledstanes | Company's Ship                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Matthew Isacke                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Thos Milron           | O. Wigram                                                        |   |   |   | •        |   |     |   |           |   |
| Tons.                                                             |        | 1325                                                                                                                                              | 1283                                                                            | 1334                          | 1279                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 1415                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1330                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 1417                                                                                                            | 1323                                                     | 8                                                                                                           |                 | 35                            | 98                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 1335                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 88                    | 388                                                              |   |   | _ |          |   |     | _ |           | _ |
| Ships.                                                            |        | 6 Dunira                                                                                                                                          | 8 General Harris                                                                | 6 Thomas Coutts               | St. Dand Sort 1542 Ogen Hate J. O. M. Taggart W. 1 rechults. D. J. wat                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | Retance 1135 Contract of the Samuel Hyde Retance 11415 June June 11415 June J | Mercrombie                                                                                                                                                                                                             | Earl of Balcarras                                                                                               | 2 George the Fourth 1329 Company's Ship                  | Macmen                                                                                                      | William Fairlie | Lord Lowther                  | Canning                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Orwell                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Poss negent           | Marchioness of Ely                                               |   |   |   |          |   |     |   |           |   |

| M   | lar.           | BankStock. | Pr. Ct.Red. | 3 Pr. Ct.Consols.      | 3] Pr.Ct. 3Consols. | Red.           | N. 4Pr.C.                             | LongAnnuities.  | IndiaStock. | IndiaBonds. | Exch.Bills.  |
|-----|----------------|----------------|-----------------|----------------------------|-------------------------|----------------|---------------------------------------|---------------------|-----------------|-----------------|------------------|
| 1   | 262728 | =              |                 | 83183883 838831831 | -                       |                | 100}100}100}100}              | =                   |                 | 91 93p          | 56 58p56 58p |
|     | 29             |                | _               | 83 83                      |                         |                | 100 100                               |                     |                 |                 | 58 59p58 60p |
|     | 31             |                |                 | 835841                     |                         |                | 1004100                               | -                   |                 | 92p             | on oop           |
|     | Apr.           | _              | _               | 841841                     | _                       |                | 100110031001101                   | _                   | _               |                 | 59 61p           |
| 1   | 2              | -              | _               | 84 84184 841           |                         | _              | 1003100                               | -                   | l —             | 94 961          | o 60 65b         |
|     | 3              | _              | _               | 84 648                     |                         |                |                                       | ì —                 | -               |                 | -                |
| 1   | 4              | _              |                 | 83784                      |                         | _              | 1003100                               | -                   | -               | 96 97           | 60 62b           |
| - 1 | 57         | _              | _               |                            | 'l —                    | ¦ —            | _                                     | -                   | -               | -               | -                |
| 1   | 8              |                |                 | _                          | -                       |                | _                                     | -                   | -               |                 | e 61 62p         |
|     | 9              | 204            | 831             | 83381                      | 908903                  | 908908         | 1003100                               | 3 18 3 19           |                 | 1               | p 61 62p         |
|     | 10             |                |                 | 183 183 183         |                         | 901901         | 1001100                               | 1848                | 24516           | 04 06           | p 61 62p         |
| - 1 | 11             | 2031           |                 | i 83§83                    |                         | 90390          | 100 101                               | 188 185             | 246246      | 94 30           | 61 62p           |
|     | 12             |                |                 | i 83 i 84                  | } —                     | 90390          | 101 100                               | 1 1015 10           | 240             | 94 95           | p 61 62p         |
|     | 14             | 205            | 83183           | 1 —                        |                         | 90790          | 1011101                               | 1 1016 10           | 94617           | 95 96           | p 61 62p         |
| 1   | 15             | 204            |                 | 83784                      |                         | 90391          | 101 $101$ 101 $ 101 | 19ta                | - 103           | 96p             | -                |
|     | 16             | I -            |                 | 184184                     |                         | 0110101401 | 101 101                               | 191                 | _               | 97p             | 64 65p           |
| 1   | 17             | 2051 1         | 83883           | § 84§84                    | 915                     | 00401          | 1013101                               | 1811 19             | 24617           | 96 98           | p 63 65p         |
|     | 18             | 20435          | 83483           | 3 84                       |                         | 011            | 101 3101                              | 19 <sub>1</sub>     | 1 -             | 970             | 64 66P           |
|     | 19             | 2051           | 83183           | 84184                      | 8 -                     | 91291          | 1013102                               | 191                 |                 | 96 98           | p 69 66p         |
|     | 21             | 007101         | 04884           | 7 84 841 85185         | 1 928924                | 91792          | 1021102                               | 191 19 <sub>1</sub> | 248             | -               | 64 66p           |
|     | 22             | 20/18          | 0.1804          | 7 00 800                   |                         |                |                                       |                     |                 |                 | JC4 65           |
|     | 2324       | 2081 0         | 84485           | 85385                      | 991                     | 92192          | 1021102                               | 191 19              | 249             | 98 99           | p 64 65p         |
|     | 25             | 2003 9         | 300             | 33,400                     | 1 _                     | 1 -            | 1 -                                   | '            |                 |          |                  |

THE # ASIATIC JOURNAL

FOR

JUNE, 1828.

Original Communications,

&c. &c. &c.

ON THE INTELLECTUAL CHARACTER OF THE HINDUS.

Or the Hindu understanding a low estimate is formed by a very large majority of those persons who speak and write of India. The notions entertained in England on this subject are generally imbibed from the works of Mr. Ward, the Abbé Dubois, Mr. Mill, and some of the missionaries, the latter of whom, communicating chiefly with the most ignorant portion of the people, are prone to represent the intellect of the natives unfairly.

It must be acknowledged that there are certain striking features in their superstitions, their manners, and institutions, which cannot be reconciled with conclusions favourable to the natural understanding of the Hindus. But the human character, collectively as well as individually considered, presents strange anomalies; and whilst we are sensible how many instances there have been of men of the strongest intellect being enslaved by singular prejudices, or betraying peculiarities which manifest decided tokens of mental infirmity, we should be slow and reluctant to infer from such examples of absurdity as we really discover in many parts of the Hindu social system, that the minds of the people are naturally weak.

The contempt which Europeans in India, generally speaking, display towards the natives, is much to be regretted: it not only tends to propagate and to confirm the vulgar notions of their inferiority, but to obstruct the efforts of the Hindus to vindicate their claims to a fairer character, inasmuch as it represses the eagerness of those Europeans who would otherwise encourage them, and freezes the noble current of emulation in the Hindus themselves.

Meanwhile, however, some few individuals amongst that nation, in spite of all disadvantages, have ventured even upon the uncouth and difficult path of European literature. It will perhaps, be hardly believed that there are instances of Hindus, who, by their own almost unassisted exertions, have attained so great a proficiency, or rather perfection, in English composition, as to equal in strength, purity, and accuracy of style, some of the most respectable modern English writers.

Our readers have already been introduced to an acquaintance with Ram Raz, the present head English master of the College of Fort St. George, who, by inde *Asiat, Journ. Vol. 25. No. 150.

4 Z

indefatigable diligence, prompted solely by an ardent and disinterested love of literature, has acquired a comprehensive knowledge of Western as well as Indian learning, and a remarkable case and fluency in English composition. In the last volume of this Journal (p. 584), we inserted a sketch of the state of education amongst the natives of Bangalore, from his pen, unaided, as we were assured from unexceptionable authority, by any European. A system of instruction in English proposed and recommended to the natives of India, also written by Ram Raz, was contained in the same volume from whence the before-mentioned article was extracted;* but we confess that that essay was distinguished by such marks of intellectual superiority, and such familiar conversation with English writers, that, although convinced ourselves that no European could divide the credit of it with the learned Hindu, we despaired of impressing our readers with the same conviction.

Having been lately favoured with the perusal of two letters addressed by Ram Raz to Richard Clarke, Esq., late Senior Member of the Board of Superintendence for the College of Fort St. George, now residing in England, and which are calculated to dissipate every doubt as to the genuineness of the pieces already referred to, we should have been glad to lay these interesting compositions before our readers, as decisive testimonics in favour of the Hindu mind, and as containing besides, a pledge of what Europe may gain by a proper stimulus being given to the studies and inquiries of the natives of India; but as the documents have been read before the Royal Asiatic Society, and it is contrary to a standing rule of that body to publish any where except in their own Transactions (where these letters will probably appear), we can only give a general view of their contents.

The two letters are written in reply to a request from Mr. Clarke that the writer would bestow some attention upon the subject of Hindu architecture, and give the result of his inquiries to the public. Ram Raz, accordingly, has employed his leisure time in collecting materials for an essay on that subject; he has studied the Silm Sastra, the sacred repository of all the learning relating to that branch of art, as well as other standard treatises on architecture, and has also interrogated some of the native architects and sculptors conversant with the practical part of the art, who are unfortunately of the lowest order of society, and consequently excessively ignorant. He has the candour and good sense to lament the adulteration of the Hindu Sastras, and to confess that some of the best Indian writers "have been guided by a mistaken ambition of rendering themselves reputable by the difficulty and abstruseness of their style, rather than by an anxiety to make themselves intelligible." The jealousy and hatred felt by the caste of architects towards the Brahmin tribe, he says, have induced the former to conceal their sacred volumes from the world; and being debarred themselves from the knowledge of the very language in which they were written, the theory of the art became lost even to the latter, whilst the practical part of it continued to be transmitted from father to son as an inheritance. Ram Raz, in his second letter, declares that he is intent upon, and proposes shortly to furnish, for the Royal Asiatic Society, a short but comprehensive essay upon Indian architecture, with some descriptions of a few temples and porticoes in the Carnatic, illustrated by designs. We subjoin one passage of this letter to shew the style of the writer, and the judicious and sensible character of his remarks.

"The subject itself is curious, and highly deserving of the attention of the antiquarian and the philosopher. A correct account and accurate elucidation of the art of building practised by the Hindus must throw considerable light upon the early progress of architecture in general. Some of the Western authors have traced a certain resemblance in the leading features of the buildings in Egypt and India, and have thence concluded that there has very early heen a communication of architectural knowledge between the two countries. But it is not altogether improbable that this resemblance may be merely owing to accident, inasmuch as in architecture, as well as in every other art indisnensably necessary to the comfort of mankind, two or more nations may possess something in common without having any intercourse with each other: for the wants felt by man being the same, it is not surprising that the remedies resorted to for supplying them should be also similar, or nearly so. If, on the other hand, however, both these countries had actually any connection in early ages, it is hard to determine which of them may have been indebted to the other. The Western writers on antiquities have not placed this matter beyond a doubt; and for my own part, I will not venture to affirm any thing with certainty until I have collected sufficient information to form an opinion as to the alleged affinity in the architectures of Egypt and India."

* Second Report of the Madras School-Book Society, of which institution Ham Raz is native secretary.

Among other topics to which Ram Raz alludes in the course of these epistles, is the great want of accurate information under which Europe labours in regard to several most important points connected with the character of the people of India. The works of Ward and Dubois, he says, notwithstanding their boasted opportunities of gaining information on those points, as well as the history of Mr. Mill, "abound with gross misrepresentations." He does not deny that there are many exceptionable and vicious customs amongst the various tribes which inhabit India, and differ from each other in language, modes of thinking, and religious sentiments; but he contends that it is uncharitable to draw general inferences from particular cases, and to suffer prejudices against certain classes of the people to fortify our aversion to the great mass. He brings forward the example of caste to prove how little the most essential points in the Hindu character are understood in Europe: all that has been written on this subject by Europeans, he says, is not only imperfect but incorrect. Of their literature, too, he observes, our knowledge is still very limited; particularly of the Hindu philosophy. It is gratifying, however, to read the compliment paid to Mr. Colebrooke in this letter, by a writer so well able to appreciate the labours of this eminent individual. Referring to the able papers of Mr. Colebrooke on the Philosophy of the Hindus, which are published in the first volume of Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society, Ram Raz states that it was not easy for him to persuade some of his learned countrymen that these admirable essays were the production of a European gentleman, and composed without the assistance of any individual of their own class.

To the example of Ram Raz, we may add that of Radhacant Deb of Calcutta, who writes English with equal purity. We subjoin an extract from a letter addressed by him to the Royal Asiatic Society:

"Born and residing in such a country as this, where mechanical knowledge is very little cultivated, it cannot be expected that the natives should possess any elevated degree of knowledge in arts and manufactures, with the exception of what they are daily practising, the scanty remains of that which their forefathers have left, and the knowledge of which has descended through Mahomedan despotism and cruelty.

"The formation of societies for the promotion of the knowledge of science and and literature in general, as well as of arts and manufactures, is beneficial to the country where such bodies are united; but when they link with similar societies or individuals of talent in other countries, by correspondence, the benefit arising therefrom is universal, especially when these learned men communicate their ideas to one another without regard to nation or religion.

"In this good work the Europeans have far surpassed other nations; and allow me to express my admiration of the plan the society has adopted for the diffusion of knowledge, by opening a correspondence with the natives of Hindostan, who cannot but feel immeasurable pleasure and gratitude at the conviction that their rulers, in common with your society, are ever watchful, to promote the welfare of the ruled, by the dissemination of the knowledge of literature and the arts among them."

It must not be concealed that Radhacant Deb is reported by Bishop Heber to be a bigot to Hinduism; and he certainly gave a striking proof of his bigotry when, at the meeting of natives convened at Calcutta, in December 1823, to address Lord Hastings on his resignation of the government, he strenuously urged the propriety of specially thanking his Lordship for not interfering with the burning of widows: a proposition which it required the persevering efforts of two sensible Hindus to dissuade the meeting from adopting.

Assuming, as we have a right to do, that there is no inherent deficiency in the Hindu mind, and that it is capable of appreciating the literature of Europe, and of conforming itself to the ideas generated by the European mode of civilization, it will tend to accelerate and give a new impulse to the endeavours now making towards educating the natives of India, if some of the most obvious advantages likely to accrue from the success of that object be plainly developed.

The policy of founding our empire in India upon the ignorance of the natives, though it may have been conceived by some speculative theorists, and recommended by the example of former conquerors, was never, we firmly believe, acted upon by the British Government. There are European writers at the present day,* who affect to perceive the danger and the impolicy of instructing the Hindus; who maintain that the "new civilization" which we shall thereby give them will dissolve their connexion not only with us, but with each other; and that we shall, by education, neutralize their character, and place them in "the most deplorable condition." To such a class of philosophers—if it be not insulting to the name of philosophy so to misapply the designation—we shall merely oppose the sentiment of a late governor-general of India, the Marquess of Hastings, who in one of his earliest visitation-discourses to the College of Fort William, thus expressed himself, in regard to the subject of educating the natives:

This government never will be influenced by the erroneous, shall I not rather call it the designing, position, that to spread information among men is to render them less tractable and less submissive to authority. If an abuse of authority be planned, men will be less tractable and submissive in proportion as they have the capacity of comprehending the meditated injustice. But it would be treason against British sentiment to imagine that it ever could be the principle of this Government to perpetuate ignorance, in order to ensure paltry and dishonest advantages over the blindness of the multitude.†

We might appeal not only to the recorded testimony of other local governors, even that of Mr. Adam, the reputed enemy of the Hindu press, in support of the assertion that it is the desire of the Government to encourage education education amongst their Eastern subjects; but to the official declaration of the Court of Directors, through their organ; the chairman, who, in a debate at the East-India House, on the 21st June 1826, declared that, "if there were any merit in an anxious desire to propagate education throughout India, the advantages to be derived from which were fully admitted by all persons, the Court of Directors could fairly say not only that they entertained that desire, but that they had acted in conformity to it." Lastly, we might appeal to the language and to the acts of the Legislature of Great Britain.

· See an ensuing article, "The Calcutta School-Book Society."

† Address to the College of Fort William, 30th June 1817.

$ See his discourse to the College, 18th July 1823.

Admitting, however, for an instant, the utility of that selfish policy which would construct a dominion upon the barbarism of a people, the practicability of such a project in India may be doubted. Where there appears to be an incorrigible inaptitude to imbibe instruction, where every effort to implant the seeds of civilization seems to be employed in vain, as in the case of the aborigines of New Holland, we may calculate upon the probability that our relative state amongst such a people will continue the same. But in India the case is totally different: the intellectual character has there become depressed by the force of adverse circumstances; and the pressure being withdrawn, as it has been by the subversion of the Mohammedan rule and the substitution of the British, though it may be long before the innate elasticity of the mind recovers its tone, it eventually will, and the gradual influence of a government fundamentally opposed to their mental improvement will be to render the Hindus hostile to its continuance, and eager to overthrow it.

There are three obvious sources of benefit resulting from a different line of policy. The exaltation of the Hindus in the scale of intellectual character is likely to be advantageous, first, in respect to the permanency of their present government, so long as it is well administered; secondly, with regard to their emancipation from the thralls of paganism and priestcraft, and their sincere conversion to the principles of Christianity; and lastly, with reference to a knowledge of their history, character, learning, and institutions, of all which subjects we yet know but little, and which are, generally speaking, imperfectly understood by the Hindus themselves.

Want of mental culture must render men unfit to fill more than the lowest subordinate offices of government. The absence of that wholesome discipline, which early education especially exercises over the human mind, gives scope for the growth of vices, which destroy its natural good qualities. An ignorant man knows no other engines of government than force or fraud, which generate, on the other hand, duplicity, intrigue, and perjury. some of the besetting sins of the Hindus: they cannot yet learn to confide in each other. Such a one may be very honest, said a respectable native to the late Bishop Heber, but I prefer trusting Europeans: "European gentlemen have reputation to lose." But can any one doubt that the vices of the Hindu character are the result of long-continued oppression operating upon ignorance; that by the discontinuance of the one and the absence of the other, the joint effect would cease; that if the bulk of the upper and middle classes of the Hindus had made even a less progress in mental improvement than Ram Raz, there would be a disinclination to admit them to government offices, and that by so admitting them they could feel any other desire than to strengthen and consolidate a government which would then be, to a certain extent, their

Some may consider it problematical whether a Hindu population, imbued with liberal education, could be held in subjection to a handful of foreigners.

But

But they would be more likely to submit to us if they were conscious that all their claims to independence were derived from our generosity. And were the British power to be lost, all would not be lost: should even our influence over the Hindus, by some strange fatality, become forfeited, and their affections be wholly estranged from us, Great Britain would still enjoy the unrivalled renown of having diffused the languages and the arts of Europe amongst some hundreds of millions of the human race, and of having erected a monument more imperishable than the pyramids of Egypt.

That education must be the precursor of Christianity in India, we apprehend no sober-minded man can deny—no man whose judgment is not in some measure warped by taking only a partial view of the subject, without a perfect acquaintance with the Hindu character. Nothing but a belief that there is some miraculous property in the lessons derived exclusively from the Holy Scriptures, such as Popish missionaries pretended were attached to their relics, can delade sensible persons into a notion that men incapable, through habit as well as rudeness, of comprehending the evidences of Christianity, should, without previous tuition, embrace it, or that they should ever exchange their own faith for another's, except from the blind impulse which leads a weak mind to follow implicitly a superior. It is unnecessary to cite authority in support of a proposition which is almost self-evident.

There is another view in which the education of the Hindus will serve the end of evangelizing India. The late Bishop Heber, whose sentiments are regarded by all parties with respect, has recorded his deliberate opinion, that the conversion of India will be best accomplished by the agency of natives of the country, and that missionaries should no longer be sent out from Europe. The preparation of natives for such an office is a most important preliminary to the execution of this wise plan.

The accessions which history and science would obtain from the application of the Hindu understanding, enlightened by the study of Western learning, to those various topics which, though at first sight merely objects of curiosity, are in reality intimately allied to subjects of greater importance, are manifestly great. The science of politics is dependent upon history, and upon national morals; an acquaintance with the antiquities and the native sciences of Hindustan is essential to enable us to define the proper objects which should be sought for by Government, and to a judicious selection of the means whereby that end may be attained. One of the wisest and most benevolent plans of administration ever devised for India—we mean the permanent settlement of the land revenue in the Bengal provinces—has introduced so many local evils as almost to neutralize the good effects of the principle upon which it was founded, solely because those by whom it was carried into effect acted upon theoretical grounds, and were ignorant of the country and the people.

MADRAS REVENUE SYSTEMS.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: The following documents exhibit a portion of the discretionary powers vested in collectors under the ryotwar plan of Sir Thomas Munro, and the legal control under which zemindars are placed by Lord Cornwallis's plan of a permanent settlement of the land revenue.

RYOT-WARY.

Extracts from the Diaries of the Principal Collector and Subordinate Collectors of the Ceded Districts.

1802, December. Examine the accounts of the villages in Muddugscrah, which for the last thirty years have been accustomed to pay the potails in kind, who pay the Government in money. Being convinced that this practice is injurious both to the cultivator and the Government, order the aumildar (native collector) to give all warum lands (lands assessed with a grain revenue) next year for money rents, and on no other terms.

1802, October. Engaged in disputes with the potails about the assessment, which they agree to after much alterca-

1803, February. Receive letter from the aumildar (native collector) of Jummulmudjor, mentioning that great number of ryots (cultivators) in consequence of the failure of the crops had fled to Kurnoul, where they were protected by the jageerdars. Write to the nabob to order his jageerdars to send back all ryots owing balances.

1803, February. Receive accounts from the aumildar of Door, that a number of the ryots had gone off to Bejugunpilli. Write to the nabob to order them to be sent back 1804, May. Receive letters from several aumildars (native collectors), stating that some of their ryots had gone to other districts. Order all those against whom there are balances to be sent back, and those who have paid up their balances to be allowed to go where they please.

1802, December. Employed in debating with the potails of Punganoor, who object to their settlement being so high as last year, on account of the want of rain.

1803, August. Proceed to Kootamuddi, in Dhermayer, to ascertain exactly what ZEMINDARY.

Decree of the Sudder Adalut or. Supreme Court of the East-India Company at Madras.

"Ramasawmy Eyer, under date the 21st October 1808, sued Armoga Moodaly, zemindar of Ponary, in the prince of Chingleput, to recover possession of fortyfive cawnies of Nunjah arable land situated in the village of Aumoor, which lands he claimed a right to cultivate on merrassi tenure, but of which he had been deprived by the said Armoga Moodaly. Ramasawmy Eyer further sued to recover the sum of star pagodas 115, on account of damages sustained by him in consequence of his being dispossessed of the lands in question, and to compel the said Armoga Moodaly to grant him a lease (pottah) for the said lands."

The decree then proceeds to detail the decision passed on this case by the local district court, and on appeal by the Provincial Court of Appeal. From the decree of the Provincial Court the Sudder Court, seeing reason to doubt the correct. ness of the grounds on which the Provincial Court had determined the question, resolved, under date the 31st July 1812, to admit a special appeal. The Sudder Court's decree then declares:

" That the Zillah and Provincial Courts erred in declaring the respondent Ramasawmy Eyer entitled to receive from the appellant Aroomooga Moodaly, a pottah, for a money-rent at an annual fixed beriz (assessment) of star pagodas 60 6 16: there is not a tittle of evidence to shew that any such right exists on the part of the respondent; on the contrary, all the evidence taken regarding the assessment of the lands shews that it was not fixed, but derived from a division of the produce. which must fluctuate with the seasons, and the commutation price of which must be influenced by its plenty or scarcity. " It part of the balances in the neighbouring villages can be realized without distressing the inhabitants.

1804, March. Proceed to Nellacheroo. Receive complaints from the inhabitants of several villages of the district of Kavelgoontah, stating their inability to pay their rent from the failure of the crops. Inform them that no remission can be made, as their villages have not suffered more than others.

1805, June. Dismiss an assessor for underrating some lands and overrating others in collusion with the curnums.

others in collusion with the curnums, 1805, July. Subordinate collector of Cumhum.

Receive a letter from Colonel Munro, enclosing copy of a letter with a Gentoo deposition, received from the collector of Guntoor, relative to ryots who had deserted from his collectorship into one of the villages of this division, and directing the fugitives to be given up.

Examine the statement of authorized enams resumed in Tarpulbue, and order the rents to be collected from them.

1817, May. The Board of Revenue at Madras stated to the Governor in Council, that when they found that in many places the former ryotwar settlement existed only in the accounts of the collector's cutcherry, and never was adopted or followed by the people; that it was very inaccurately established in other districts, and that in general the result of most of the former ryotwar survey has been unsatisfactory; but above all, when they observe the little regard paid to ancient usages and private rights under the surveys hitherto made in the ruotwar plan, they were desirous in reverting to that system to guard against these evils," &c. &c .- Page 872, vol. i., Revenue Selections.

" It is not for the courts to interfere in determining the rate of which the share in grain shall be commuted for a payment in money. This is a point clearly left to be settled by the parties themselves, and in adiusting the rate each party will consult his own interest; the zemindar, in avoiding the expense, risk, and trouble of ascertaining, receiving, keeping, and disposing of his share of the grain, or the cultivator in endeavouring to secure a reasonable profit for the expense, risk, and trouble from which he relieves the zemindar; when the rate shall be settled by a written agreement, the courts may be called upon to enforce it.

"In the present case it is clear that a fixed beriz of star pagodas 66 6 16 for the forty-five cawnies of land would not be equitable, for the respondent Ramasamy Eyer himself offered a rent of pagodas 81 for the same land; to fix the rent at the former amount, therefore, would be to punish the zemindar by a permanent diminution of his property, while all that can in justice be required of him is a compensation to the respondent for the loss which he has sustained.

"The court, therefore, on mature consideration of all the circumstances of the case, resolve to confirm that part of the Provincial Court's decree which adjudges to Ramasawmy Eyer the right to hold possession of the lands in question, and to set aside that part of the said decree which declares the respondent, Ramasawmy Eyer, entitled to receive from the appellant, Aroomooga Moodaly, a pottah for a mey-rent at an annual fixed beriz (assessment) of star pagodas 60 6 16.

"It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the respondent, Ramasawmy Eyer, is entitled to hold possession of the forty-five cawnies of land in question, on a pottal defining the rate of division of the produce, which rate, as prescribed by Section ix. Regulation xxx. of 1802, shall be determined according to the rates prevailing in the year preceding the assessment of the permanent jumma on those lands, or if those rates be not ascertainable, according to the rates established for lands of the same description and quality."

1828.] ( 721 )

THE RAMNAD CASE.

THE appeal regarding the succession to the Ramnad zemindary (a considerable territory in the Southern Carnatic), which has acquired some interest from the incidental mention of the subject in the House of Commons by Mr. Brougham, has been at length decided by the Privy Council, as stated in our last number.

We have before us some documents connected with the history of this transaction, including the decrees of the provincial court of Madura, and of the Sudder Adawlut at Madras, copies of the evidence, &c., from whence we propose to lay a pretty copious abstract of the case before our readers.

The Rajah of Ramnad, who reckons amongst his titles* those of "descendant of the sun," "superior to the kings of the earth," "usurper of all countries seen by him," "retainer of his conquests," &c., cannot trace his dignity to a very remote date. Towards the close of the sixteenth century, the ancestor of the Sétupatis was merely a chief of the village of Pogalore, a few miles from Ramnad.

A history of the poligars of Ramnad, which is preserved in one of the temples and recognized as a work of authority, relates that certain Marawars (the caste of the Ramnad family) were appointed in ancient times, by an emperor of Hindustan, to watch the holy bridge near Raméswaram, an island in the straits between Ceylon and the continent, whereon is situated a pagoda of great sanctity. The emperor gave them the village of Pogalore.

The first of the family who obtained a territory was Wodeyaor Sadakay Tawen, who received the pollam of Ramnad in sovereignty, from Mootoo Crishnapa Náyaca, king of Madura, under the condition of clearing the country of robbers, and keeping a free passage for the pilgrims to the island of Ráméswaram. The prince conferred upon him the title of Sétupati, or "watcher of the holy bridge," which has since distinguished the family.

He died A.D. 1623. His son Cooten, who succeeded him, enlarged the territory by the addition of the northern talooks which he conquered. He died in 1637, and was succeeded by his younger brother Dalawah.

During this reign there was some dissention in the family, and the celebrated Tremalla Náyaca, or Trimul Naig, imprisoned Dalawah for some time at Madura, his brother governing the country in his stead. He was released in 1640, and was murdered by his younger brother in 1649, leaving no issue. The territory was then equally divided between the three sons of Dalawah's sister, until the death of two of these nephews, when the government was reunited under the survivor, Ragoonatha, in 1659.

Ragoonatha Sétupati reigned for twenty-six years, dying in 1685. His two sons, Raja Souriah, and Audanah, reigned only a few months, and left no issue or nephews; whereupon the Marawars assembled and named for a successor a distant relation (uncle's grandson to the last prince), named Keleven Ragoonatha, who became poligar A.D. 1686, and governed the country thirty-seven years. His son, Bowani Sunkra Tawen, not being of the Marawar caste, was not allowed to succeed; wherefore his father's sister's son, named Vijia Ragoonatha, became poligar in 1723; he ruled for fifteen years, and died without issue.

The events which succeeded the death of Vijia Ragoonatha are related in an article which will be found in our twenty-third volume, p. 646, and need not be repeated here.

The princes who succeeded were Sunteesbara Ragoonatha, son-in-law to Vijia Ragoonatha; Mootoo Ragoonatha, his brother, who obtained the government in 1729, and was succeeded by his son Mootoo Comarah Vijia Ragoonatha, in 1735. He ruled for thirteen years, and died without issue. His sister's husband was permitted to succeed; but not conducting himself to the satisfaction of the people, he was deposed, and Vijia Ragoonatha appointed in his stead. He governed thirteen years, and died without legitimate issue in 1762, being succeeded by his sister's son, Mootoo Ramalinga Vijia Ragoonatha.

Soon after the accession of this chief, the Carnatic became the scene of a succession of wars which totally disordered the country. In 1795, Ramnad came under the government of the British, by an arrangement with the Nawab, and in that year Mootoo Ramalinga, the poligar, for some reason which is not apparent, was seized and imprisoned. It was not the intention of the British Government to confiscate his possessions, but merely to deprive him, individually, of his authority.

Whilst the zemindary was under the immediate control of the British authorities, two claims were made to the Government of Fort St. George for the succession; one from Mungeleswara Nauchear, sister of the deposed poligar; and the other on behalf of Sevagawmy Nauchear, his daughter and only child, an infant.

The Madras Government, after investigating the titles of the claimants, thought it best, under all the circumstances, as a matter of expediency, to direct that the sister of the deposed poligar, who was an aged woman, and not likely to have children, should be invested with the title and authority of Ranee, and that the daughter (who, though a minor, had been married, but without her aunt's consent) should be placed under the Ranee's care and guardianship, with strict injunctions that she should be well treated. The Minutes of Consultation, dated 3d July 1795, are expressed in the following terms:

Under the various difficulties which present themselves upon this subject, the Board are desirous of preserving a due regard to the claims of those persons whose pretensions are the most prominent, without divesting themselves entirely of motives of political expediency, which seem to require some attention in the final arrangement of the succession. With respect to the political expediency, it is of importance to prevent the deposed Poligar from having any influence whatsoever in the country, or from holding out an idea of the probability of his return to the Government; and it is of great consequence, that the other Poligars to the southward, whose refractory dispositions have so frequently disturbed the peace of their several districts, should be deterred from the commission of similar offences by an apprehension of the ruin in which they may be involved. Under the impression of all these circumstances, the Board have come to the determination of nominating the sister of the deposed Poligar to the succession, and have also resolved to place his daughter under her charge, without touching upon the question of the future expectations of the child to succeed to the government, expectations, however which may reasonably be entertained, from the little probability of her aunt's pregnancy.

In the year 1803, the Governor in Council of Fort St. George, in the course of its arrangements consequent upon the cession of the Carnatic provinces by treaty with the Nawaub in 1801, issued a sunnud for the permanent settlement of the revenue in the zemindary of Ramnad,* which was directed to Sétupati

The assessment for the semindary was fixed in this document at the annual sum of 94,733 star pagodas.

Rance Mungeleswara Nauchear, and purported to convey a right to hold the zemindary in perpetuity, or to transfer by sale, gift, or otherwise, any part thereof, to whomsoever she might think proper.

This sunnud appears to have been regarded by the Ranee as changing the nature of the estate, &c., and vesting her with an absolute right over the zemindary, superseding all other pretensions.

In February 1811 the Rance died, and it then appeared that she had executed a will by which she had bequeathed the zemindary to an adopted child, to the prejudice of her niece, with whom she had been for several years at variance. The will was dated 11th April 1807, and was witnessed by Colonel Martinz, Mr. Parish, the collector, and the Predaun, or minister of the Rance.

The fact of the adoption, which took place in 1803, after the receipt of the sunnud, was confirmed by several witnesses. The individual adopted was Anasawmy Tawen, alleged to be the son of a slave woman named Vulliamay, of the Agambady caste, by Mootoo Curpa Tawen, husband of the sister of Ramasawmy Tawen, the Rance's husband; and he was born in the year 1795. He had been introduced into the family of the Rance during the life-time of Ramasawmy Tawen, who died in 1801 or 1802. One of the witnesses, a Bramin of Ráméswaram, thus described the ceremony of adoption:

The Rance sent for me, on the 21st Vyasce of the year Roodrogaury, to come on the next day. Having collected several Bramins, as well as religious books, for the performance of the adoption, I accordingly went to the Ranee on the 22d, with Bramins and books, and assigned the offices to the Bramins for that purpose. The Bramins performed the ceremony of adoption by keeping a coombum, or pot, with water and perfumed hamum, or fire sacrifice, and other ceremonies, according to the Hindoo law; at which time the Ranee desired the parents of the deponent (in presence of several Bramins, gentlemen, and their relations, of the Marawah caste) to authorize her permanently to adopt the boy, to procure posterity, whom they had given, during the life-time of her husband, for the purpose; to which the parents answered, that they would give the boy, and accordingly gave him in adoption to Rance Mungaleswara Nauchear; at which time the Ranee gave the mother 21 chuckrums, as charge of rearing. Afterwards the defendant was placed upon the lap of Mungaleswara Nauchear, and then I gave her munjaneer (or saffron-water) which had been consecrated, and the Bramins sprinkled the sacred water on the Rance's head. I afterwards gave milk, fruits, and honey, in a silver cup, to the Rance; she then ordered the ring which had been worn by Ramasawmy Tawen to be brought, and put the same into the like cup, and gave it to the defendant, as well as milk, fruits, &c. He afterwards gave alms and dasanum to the Bramins, &c., placed the defendant on the lap of the gentleman, and then sent him to their home, making gifts of grain.

Another witness described the ceremony of appointment to the heirship in the following words:

On the 28th Vyasee, the Stallatars, and others, were present; the Goorookuls and Pundarums of Ráméswaram were sunimoned; Gungawater and Codecteertum were sent for, and the Bramius performed the ceremony of chomoom, and afterwards brought consecrated water, and poured it upon the head of the present zemindar, as purification; the ceremonies of abeshaigum were performed with holy water and Gunga water. He was dressed and ornamented with jewels, and the Ráméswarem Stallatars were presented with silk cloths; then the other Stallatars. Afterwards he went out in procession, and on his return to the Ranee's hall, the different people performed the homage respectively, due from them; afterwards, betel and nuts were distributed to the Tavers, Bramins, Pillays, and others, and the present zemindar retired into the naiace.

In token of the genuineness of his adoption, the individual adopted, on the death of the Ranee, was allowed to set fire to her funeral pile. At his adoption, he took the name of Mootoo Vijia Ragoonatha Sétupati.

Sevagawiny Nauchear, the daughter of the deposed poligar (the date of whose death does not appear) made several applications to the Government respecting her rights during the life-time of her aunt, which were not attended to, owing to some want of formality. After the decease of the Ranee, she made a formal claim to the zemindary, in an arzee to Government, founding it upon her birth, and upon the recognition of her right in the Minutes of Consultation already quoted. The question was referred for investigation to the Board of Revenue, which instituted a strict inquiry into the whole transaction.

The substance of the report of the Board is, that the deposition of the late poligar was not accompanied by any declaration setting aside the claims of his family; on the contrary, in the agreement concluded upon that occasion with the Nawab of Arcot, for the administration of the affairs of Ramnad by the Company's officers, it was expressly stipulated that a successor to the deposed poligar should be appointed as soon as the person entitled to succeed him could be satisfactorily ascertained: that from the tenour of the Minute of Consultation, it was apparent that the Board was not convinced of the preferable legal right of the sister over that of the daughter; that the letters addressed by the Board to the collector and to the Ranee showed that it was not the intention of the Government to set aside the ancient family, or to interfere with the course of succession, further than considerations of political expediency were thought at the time to require; and though such considerations did enter into the grounds of the decision passed in favour of the sister, yet the daughter was regarded as her presumptive and natural successor: that the late Ranee, though her claim to the succession was acknowledged in July 1795, was not placed in possession of the territory till February 1803, preparatory to the determination of the permanent settlement, then under the consideration of the special commission. The report concludes with recommending that the adopted son (who was still a minor) be, in the first instance, allowed possession of the zemindary, under the prima facie title given by the will, leaving the other party to establish her claim by a regular suit in the courts. This recommendation was adopted by the Madras Government.

A suit was thereupon instituted in the Provincial Court in the year 1813, by Rance Sevagawny Nauchear, plaintiff, against Streemathoo Heraniah Garbah Ravecoola Moottoo Vijia Ragoonatha Sétupati, defendant. The plaintiff alleged, and adduced testimony to prove, that her ancestors had enjoyed the sovereignty of the zemindary of Rannad for thirteen generations; that on the deposition of her father, the nomination of her aunt was a mere temporary arrangement during her own minority; that her aunt, conceiving an enmity against the plaintiff, and wishing to set aside her lawful pretensions, contrary to the intentions of the British Government, had pretended to adopt the defendant, who, after the death of the Rance, alleged that she had bequeathed to him the zemindary; that the defendant, being the son of a slave, and of the Agambady caste, and not a Marawar, could not be adopted or succeed to the zemindary; that the late Rance did not adopt him during the life-time of her husband, conformably to the Hindu law, and that he did not perform the funeral ceremonies at her husband's death, wherefore the adoption was not legal, &c. The plaintiff, moreover, alleged the will to be a fabrication.

Amongst the documentary evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, is a curious remonstrance remonstrance from the high-caste inhabitants of Ramnad, wherein, after alleging that the defendant is the son of a slave-concubine, they subjoin: "as the person holding the puttum of Ramnad is the master of the holy place Ráméswaram, we consider him as a god, and prostrate ourselves before him, performing the ceremonies of homage; and as the son of the aforesaid Vullianay is of the meanest caste, we undergo disgrace by paying him the respect aforesaid."

On the part of the defendant it was alleged that the succession to the zemindary was not in the female but the male line; that it had often devolved on the issue of the sisters of the poligars, and not upon the sisters or daughters, and therefore the plaintiff had no right to the succession; that the late poligar had been dethroned by government and confined as a criminal; that the purwannah granted by Government to the late Ranee did not specify that the plaintiff was to succeed; that the defendant had been brought up by the late Ranee, and she had obtained the written permission of her husband to adopt him, if they should have no issue; that, on the 3d June 1803, with the concurrence of Mr. Lushington and Mr. Parish, and in the presence of Col. Martinz and Mr. Browne, and with the knowledge of all the relations of the family, and of every person belonging to the province, the late Ranee did adopt the defendant, and caused him to be treated as second in power in the zemindary; that the defendant's right was founded not only on this adoption, but on the will of the late Ranee, wherein he was declared sole heir, &c.

The decree of the Provincial Court, passed on the 13th December 1813. declared that the plaintiff had proved that she was the only daughter and nearest of kin in lineal descent to the last poligar of Ramnad; that no act of Government had declared the lineal succession to be forfeited; that the proccedings which terminated in the nomination of the late Rance to the zemindary, clearly proved that arrangement to have been a measure of political expediency only, and not a supersession of the plaintiff's claim; that the Government recognized the plaintiff as presumptive heiress to the zemindary by the declaration on the Minutes in 1795, and contemplated her succession thereto as a matter of course, liable to dispute only in the event of the late Rance leaving lawful issue; that the defendant had failed to establish the fact as well as the legality of his alleged adoption by the late Rance, for the following reasons: 1st, because he had not proved she had written authority from her husband to adopt the defendant; 2dly, because the defendant, at the time of his alleged adoption, must have been eight years old, which exceeds the age prescribed by the Cullua Purana for adopted sons, namely, five years; 3dly, because the defendant has not invalidated the testimony which proved him to be an illegitimate son of a bond-woman not of the Marawar caste. The Court were also of opinion that the defendant had not proved the will of the late Rance, because he had not produced the original document, nor assigned satisfactory reasons for not having compelled the person in whose possession it was alleged to be (Teagaraj Pillay, the predaun of Ramuad) to produce it, or give evidence concerning it; and the exhibit stated to be a copy of the will, being inadmissible because it was confessed to be the copy of a copy. The Court therefore pronounced the plaintiff, Rance Sevagawmy Nauchear, to be the lawful heiress of the late rajah, and decreed that she should henceforward hold and enjoy the zemindary of Ramnad, under the deed of permanent settlement granted in the name of the late Rance, and be put in immediate and entire possession of her rights.

In conformity with this decree, the plaintiff scens to have been put in possession of the zemindary; but from the statements in her own "case," it appears that litigations continued between her and the defendant, respecting some property belonging to the zemindary; and that a dispute arose between her and the late predaun, or minister, Teagaraj Pillay, whom she retained in his office, but to whose treachery she attributes most of her misfortunes.

In 1814, an appeal from the decree of the Provincial Court was lodged by the defendant in the Court of Sudder Adawlut at Madras, which Court having considered that the case had not been sufficiently investigated, in April 1815, remitted the record to the Provincial Court with directions to enforce the attendance of Teagaraj Pillay, or such other persons as might be pointed out as able to afford information regarding the two important documents, namely, the deed of consent between the late Ranee and her husband authorizing the adoption of the appellant, and the will of the late Ranee; both of which were essential to the appellant's case. The Court of Sudder Adawlut directed that the decree of the Provincial Court, for the establishment of the respondent in the zemindary, should be annulled for the present; and that, as the appellant could not furnish adequate security to justify its being put in his charge, neither party should hold it, but the zemindary should be held in attachment by the collector of the zillah of Madura during the litigation of the suit, for the benefit of the party who might be ultimately successful.

The Provincial Court, accordingly, took further evidence on the subject of these documents, including that of Teagaraj Pillay himself; upon a consideration of the whole of which, the Court (August 1815) pronounced (apparently upon very satisfactory grounds) both documents to be forgeries! They were further of opinion that the deed was in itself informal and invalid; and they consequently confirmed their former decree, adjudging the defendant to pay costs.

The Sudder Adawlut, to which court the suit returned by a supplementary petition of appeal from the original defendant, in October 1816 pronounced an opinion upon the whole case, which was diametrically opposed to that of the court below. The decree of the Sudder Adawlut states the questions for consideration to be two; the first was the right of Sevagawmy Nauchear to the succession as daughter of the late poligar: on this point the proceedings of the Government in 1795 appeared to the Court conclusive, inasmuch as they barred, in the Court's opinion, all pretensions on the part of Sevagawmy Nauchear to succeed to the zemindary as the daughter of the late poligar; her right was recognized merely as she appeared to be the presumptive heir of the Rance Mungeleswara Nauchear; it was therefore only on her relationship to the late Rance that she could found any claim to succeed. The Government, in determining the succession in favour of the late Ranec, expressed no intention of limiting the inheritance; the right of succession was left liable to be affected by any act within her power, under the Hindu law; and the rights conferred by the Government in 1795 were confirmed by the deed of permanent settlement granted in 1803. The next question was, whether the late Ranee had, by any legal act, destroyed the presumptive right of inheritance possessed by Sevagawmy Nauchear in 1795. The evidence adduced to prove the actual forgery of the deed of agreement between the late Rance and her husband (bearing date 14th May 1797) for the adoption of the appellant, appeared to this Court to be altogether unworthy of credit; whilst the opposite evidence, adduced to prove the due execution of the deed, and the adoption of the appellant by the late Rance, according to the authority of the deed, was too circumstantial and of too respectable a character to be lightly disdiscredited. With respect to the objection made to the informality of the deed, and to the legality of the adoption, on account of the age of the appellant at the time it took place, this Court had interrogated its own law-officers, who were unanimously of opinion, upon the authority of the law books, that a widow may adopt a son with the consent of her husband or her relationsthat the consent of the husband may be verbal or in writing, either mentioning the name of the child, or leaving the child to be afterwards fixed upon-that the agreement between a man and his wife to adopt a child is not void by the death of either, but that the survivor must fulfil the engagement-that the rules as to the age of the child are not the same in every caste—that a child may be adopted from the twelfth day after his birth to the day of tying on the thread worn across the body, which for Bramins is eight years, for Cshatriyas eleven, for Vysyas twelve, but Sudras, if unmarried, may be adopted till the age of six-The Court were of opinion that these dicta, deduced from the Sastras, obviated the objections as to the apparent informality of the deed of agreement, and as to the age of the appellant at the time of adoption; and with respect to the allegation that he was the son of a bond-woman of a mean caste, the Court considered it to be satisfactorily refuted by the evidence on the part of the appellant, and by his being acknowledged as a kinsman by three individuals of unimpeached credit belonging to the family inheriting the zemindary. Being satisfied of the fact and of the legality of the appellant's adoption by the late Rance, the Court did not consider it necessary to go into a consideration of the other ground of his claim, namely, the will alleged to have been left by the late Rance; and, therefore, decided that the late Rance was legally competent to adopt the appellant; that she did adopt him, and thereby destroved the presumptive right of inheritance which would appear to have been possessed by the respondent in the year 1795; the court, accordingly, reversed the decree of the Provincial Court, and adjudged the respondent, Sevagawmy Nauchear, to pay all the costs of suit in both courts.*

From this decision, the daughter of the late poligar, the respondent, appealed, in the first instance to the Governor General of India (the Marquess of Hastings); but the Supreme Government having no appellate jurisdiction in such cases, an appeal was asserted to his Majesty in Council, not, however, till August 1825.

On the 26th April last, the case having been heard ex parte, on behalf of the appellant, Sevagawmy Nauchear; the Lords of the Privy Council affirmed the decree of the Sudder Adawlut. Their Lordships were of opinion that the sunnud-i-Milkeut Istimrar, granted to the late Ranee by the Madras Government in April 1803, conveyed to her the zemindary absolutely, and that any caim of the appellant must be derived from her aunt, either as her heir at law, or under a will.

Some sympathy must naturally be felt for the appellant in this case, where original title seems indisputable, and whose loss of claim appears to have arisen from no fault on her part. In the perplexing difficulties of the question, it is not surprising that an English court, constituted like that of our Privy Council, should have taken advantage (a phrase not meant in any offensive sense) of a document, like the sunnud granted by Lord Clive, which rode over a dormant right, and created a new title. The Court might do this without thereby expressing any opinion of the justice of the act, supposing that the grant was so intended. It ought to be recollected, however, that, by the treaty with the Nawaub of the Carnatic, the Company engaged to secure the zemindary to the legitimate heir. The heir, at that period, was undoubtedly the appellant; and how far the engagement can equitably be relinquished without the consent of the party most interested, is a serious question.

• The taxed costs of the suit payable by the respondent under this decree amounted to 22,468 rupees, which was more than half the net revenue of the zemindary. The Government revenue from the zemindary is 94,733 star pagodas; the net annual revenue to the proprietor, 12,160 star pagodas.

Law and equity, however, in these difficult cases, are not equivalent or convertible terms.

NEW SETTLEMENT AT THE KEELING ISLANDS.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sir. The following nautical notice is important to oriental navigators,

The southern group of the Keeling Islands, consisting of a circular chain of low islands covered with coco-palm trees, have been found by Capt. J. C. Ross, of the ship Harnco, to form a safe harbour for ships of any size, which has been named by him Port Albion, and where he has fixed himself with his family and a few followers, giving the name of New Selma to the settlement.

As ships are liable to sustain damage after cleaning the straits of Sunda, when bound to Europe, by the resistance of a heavy swell from the S.W., while carrying sail with the S.E. trade-wind, Port Albion lying nearly in the direct route of such ships, as well as of those outward-bound to the west coast of Sumatra, or to Bengal late in the season, seems likely to become of great importance to navigators, by affording them a harbour of refuge, to repair their damages, and refuesh their crews, if sickly, with cocu-nuts, good water, and, some time hence, with hogs and poultty, which may easily be reared.

With the view of rendering Port Albion of utility to the commerce of the British empire, Capt. Ross formed the settlement of New Schma, and he has already had the satisfaction to find his expectations in some measure realized, as two ships have touched there in order to secure started butt-ends, and one from Port Jackson bound to Calcutta, stopped and filled up her water.

This southern chain of the Keeling or Coral Islands, extends from lat. 12° 4′ to 12° 14′ S., being 10 miles in length, and about 7 in breadth; the longitude of the western part is about 97° 4′ E., and the entrance of the harbour is formed between the two northernmost islands of the chain.

New Selma has been found a healthy climate; the showery season is from January to July, but light showers fall occasionally at all times. The trade wind prevails constantly, blowing with more or less strength, and varying at times between S. and E.N.E. The range of the thermometer is between 73° and 84°. The current usually sets to north-westward, sometimes 1 or 13 mile per hour.

If a ship intend to stop at Port Albion, and her longitude be uncertain, she ought to get into the parallel of lat 12. 10' S. when at a reasonable distance to the castward of these coral islands, then steer to the westward, and when their eastern part is seen, she should steer for Direction Island, which is the north-easternmost of the chain, and pass round it on the western side within a \( \frac{1}{4} \) of a mile, to give a birth to the reef that extends from the island on the west side of the entrance of the harbour; and as the bank of soundings is very steep, she should be ready to anchor in from 10 to 7 or 6 fathoms when Direction Island bears about E. or E. by N., for the depths are only 3\( \frac{3}{4} \) fathoms, with that island bearing about N.E. If unprovided with a chain cable, a spot of sandy ground ought to be selected to anchor upon, and afterward a ship may be warped into the deep water basin inside of Direction Island, or taken up the harbour by a skilful person belonging to the settlement of New Schma, where wood and water may be obtained.

Chart Office, East-India House, May 22d, 1828. JAMES HORSBURGH.

ACCOUNT OF THE NORTH-WEST COAST OF BORNEO.*

The writer of the following pages having, during a trading voyage, made a short stay at Sambas, Mompawa, and Pontianak, and made inquiries respecting the existing state of affairs, was enabled to collect a little information respecting that part of Borneo over which the Dutch residency of the north-west coast claims jurisdiction, its inhabitants, and commerce. This information was procured in the first instance from the most intelligent natives with whom he had intercourse, and afterwards submitted to the inspection of European gentlemen intimately acquainted with the coasts, who concur in the opinion that the information is correct.

The civilization of the Daya, the extirpation of piracy, the acquisition of revenue, and the appropriation of commercial advantages, may be stated as the most prominent motives which have influenced the Netherlands Government in forming those posts now united under the designation of the residency of the north-west coast of Borneo. That Government have acquired this portion of their dominions by treaties formed with the native princes since the commencement of 1812. The general principles of these treaties are, that, in consideration of the ports being placed under the immediate control of the European power, and of the sultauns of Sambas, Mompawa, Pontianak, and Matan, not negociating with other European governments, or Americans, and using their endeavours to repress piracy, these princes shall be paid a monthly stipend; and the nature of those which have been concluded with the Malayu or Daya† chieftains of the interior is, that their territories shall be administered by the Dutch, and the revenues equally divided.

This residency is supposed to extend along the coast from Ayer Hitam, which is considered the southern limit of the territories of Matan, to Palo, the northern boundary of those of Sambas, comprehending these states, those of Pontianak and Mompawa, and some of the petty chicftainships of the interior, which were not dependent on either of the foregoing powers.

The nature of the country presents almost insuperable obstacles to surveying; but a rough map has been constructed, principally from the observations of the late Mr. Muller,‡ assisted by those of other gentlemen who have travelled in various directions. By this map it would appear that the residency extends on a rough estimate over nearly one-third of the whole island. The face of the country is generally low, the Danaō Malayu, although forty-five leagues from the nearest part of the coast, being probably not more than 100 feet above the level of the sea. It presents no continuous chain of mountains; the highest land is at the back of Sambas, and between that place and Mompawa. From Sambas to Pontianak the country for a little way inland appears i These Daya are partially civilized; they pretend to be Malayu, and of course Islam, but they do not circuncise until they have become parents, and retain many of the customs peculiar to the true Daya.

* Abridged from the Singapore Chronicle.

† This gentleman was formerly in the army of his Netherlands Majesty; but, disgusted at the promotion of junior officers, resigned the service. He was then selected to explore the interior of Borneo. His talents, information, and zeal, rendered him peculiarly adapted for this hazardous undertaking, and his death is a serious loss. When examining the Danão Malayu he conjectured that the rivers of Koté and Passir might communicate with this lake, and to determine this, he ascended the former river, and at some distance in the interior was murdered by a Daya in whom he too implicitly confided. This occurred in 1825. It is to be hoped that the government will publish his journals. All the information since collected warrant the supposition that the above rivers have not their source in the lake, but rise in the range of mountains at the back of the Banjer Massin district, called by the Malayu, Gunong Malawi Pino.

from the sea to be irregular, and in some places the peaks of the hills are perfectly conical; but it does not appear to be known whether these are volcanic. With the exception of this tract, the residency is flat, sometimes presenting isolated hills; is intersected by numerous rivers and their tributary streams, and has every appearance of this part of Borneo having been originally an archipelago of numerous small islands.* The principal rivers are those of Sambas, Pontianak, Matan, Succadana, and Mompawa; many others discharge themselves also into the sea. Bars obstruct the entrance of all; on that of Pontianak there are eight feet, Sambas fifteen, and Mompawa six feet: these depths are at high-water spring tides, and the rise of the tide being from six to eight feet; the rivers at low water are nearly inaccessible excepting to very small craft. After passing the bars, the rivers are of considerable depth, and wind in graceful curves for some distance from their mouths before the falls in Malayu Riyam present obstacles to† inland navigation. Those falls are from three to thirty feet in height.

The only lake hitherto discovered is the Danaō Malayu, situated in 1° 5′ north latitude, and 114° 20′ east longitude. It was first visited by Europeans in September 1823. It is about eight leagues in length and four in breadth, and in places has a depth of eighteen feet; these dimensions are considerably increased in the rains. Two islands rise from the surface of its waters, and it is stored with numerous fish, among others the biyaivan, the roe of which is in as great demand as the träbū of Siak. Along the shores of the lake and of its islands, rocks are found which present the appearance of having suffered from the action of the sea. The largest island was named Vander Capellen, in compliment to the amiable nobleman who lately governed Java; the smallest Fobias, after one among the many gentlemen employed as commissioners for the affairs of Borneo.

The soil is generally a mould formed partly of alluvial, partly of decayed vegetable matter, about two feet deep, placed upon a white clay strongly impregnated with saltpetre.

From the disproportion between the population and the extent of land, little is cultivated, the greater part is still forests. The want of information and the limits of this memoir prevent an enumeration of more of the vegetable productions than those which are particularly useful; bulliyan (kayu bissi) or iron wood, tămbŭsŭ, mărbū marante, sluma, pārā, mādang chữmǔ, mādang prāwās, pāniyāo, tākām or kawan, batu, angsuna or bawan hutan, and ghiam, are the Malayu names of trees of large size, which afford excellent timber for house and ship-building. The kapur is used for these purposes, and produces the camphor of commerce; kranji, and arang or ebony, form articles of export, as do the oil used for culinary purposes, which is expressed from the fruit of the tănkāwān tree, dammer and kuning oil. Rattans are abundant and of pretty good quality; the best are collected about Kotaringan, which belongs to Matan.

• This hypothesis is deduced from the following facts the hills are similar to the islands along the coast in appearance and structure, the soil is generally similar to the bottom of the sea; rocks which appear to have been exposed to a surf are found in the interior, and the low land along the coast has advanced considerably since the establishment of the European posts.

† The following is the mode in which the inland trade is conducted. Bandongs, which are long narrow boats drawing little water, and entirely covered in with matting, proceed as far as the falls permit, where the cargo is discharged into bedars or small sampangs. When these meet a riyam, the cargo as well as the bedar is carried over land until past the fall. Some of the petty chiefs prohibit the traders from the lower parts of their waters from carrying their goods through their districts, and require them to be sold there, when the people of the district carry them farther up: this exists in almost every district. The whole of the inland trade is by barter; however, each article is valued in rials, an imaginary coin of two rupces, although money is almost invariably refused by the Daya for those goods they may have for sale.

The whole of Borneo is rich in mineral productions; those which have received attention in this residency are diamonds, gold, and iron.

The principal diamond mines are in the district of Landak.* The areng (conglomerate?) in which the diamonds are found, is a kind of yellowish gravelly earth, mixed with pebbles of various sizes and shapes, and is found at different depths below the surface. From fifty to sixty feet is the greatest depth to which a shaft has hitherto been sunk, and the following, it is said, are the strata which are dug through when the areng is at these depths: three feet, black mould; seventeen, yellow sandy clay; seventeen, redder ditto; six or seven of a tenacious slate-coloured clay mixed with stones; an equal depth of a similar clay without stones, but mixed with pebbles, and known by the name of amper, and six or seven of a tenacious yellow clay—the presence of the amper strata is considered a sure indication of a vein.

The mines are worked by the Daya, Malayu, and Chinese. The former proceed in the following manner: a shaft barely sufficient to permit the miner to turn round in, or at utmost two feet in diameter, is sunk to the areng; this is from one to three feet in thickness, and is dug out to the extent of seven or eight feet from the sides of the shaft, under the upper strata, which sometimes is propped up; but the laziness or improvidence of the Daya is such, that this precaution is often forgotten, the upper strata falls in, and the miners miserably perish. These accidents most frequently occur when an adjacent shaft is sunk, which is thus done: the areng in the first mine being expended, and the course of the vein ascertained, a new shaft is sunk in that direction at the distance of fifteen or sixteen feet from the preceding, to enable the miners when arrived at the areng to work back to their former mine. and the same process is repeated until the vein be exhausted. The areng is hoisted up in small baskets by bambus, on the ends of which part of a branch being left forms a small hook. The search for the diamonds is conducted in an Small dulans, circular trays slightly converging equally simple manner. towards the centre, are nearly filled with areng, and the Daya, seating himself in the nearest stream, immerses the dulan, and works the areng by hand until the earthy particles begin to separate; the dulan is then brought to the surface, and a rotatory motion is given to it, until the water it contains being saturated with earthy matter, is poured off, and this is continued till the water comes away clean. The pebbles, &c. which remain in the centre then undergo a strict examination.

The Malayu proceed in nearly a similar manner; but the superior intelligence of the Chinese teaches them to use a more efficient process. The Chinese seldom sink a shaft, but avail themselves of those which have been sunk, and the mines abandoned by the Daya or Malayu. A tank is formed, or a small stream is dammed up, and a channel being cut in the direction of the vein.

• The principal village, called also Landak, is situated about twenty-two leagues from Pontianak, in a N.E. by E. direction. It is one of the principal stations for conducting the inland trade in this part of the residency. The voyage from Pontianak occupies about five days, the tide flowing no higher than of the residency. The voyage from Pontianak occupies about twelve miles above that town. The sinuscitles of the river are, however, the principal cause of about twelve miles above that town. The sinuscitles of the river are, however, the principal cause of about twelve miles above that town. The sinuscitles of the river are, however, the principal cause of about twelve miles above that town.

† One occurred about twenty-seven years since, when sixteen men employed by a person named Haji † One occurred about twenty-seven years since, when at Batu Malingang. More recent instances might beaduced, but this is preferred as having been related by the Haji's grandson, an intelligent man from beadduced, but this is preferred as having been related by the Haji's grandson, an intelligent man from the definition of the information respecting the unless was procured, and its correctness ascertained by reference to gentlemen who had been either employed at, or visited this district.

vein, the sluices are opened, and the superior strata are entirely cleared away by the velocity of the stream, and the areng being discovered, the sluice is shut. The areng having been dug out is washed, by exposure to the repeated action of water conducted along wooden troughs fixed in an inclined plane, and not cleaned in the dulans, until the stony particles are nearly freed from extraneous matter.

The largest diamond known with certainty to have been found in these mines weighed thirty-six carats. It was long supposed that the sultaun of Matan possessed one weighing 367, which it was said he was afraid to cut lest it should prove flawed; but gentlemen to whom it has been lately shewn consider it not to be a true stone.

Formerly, if the labours of the miners were rewarded by success, which is very uncertain, stones under four carats were their property; all of that size and upwards were claimed by the Panambahan, then a tributary of Bantam. from the sultan of which state the former Dutch Company purchased this monopoly or royalty, for 50,000 dollars. At present, by treaty with the Panambahan, all the stones must be delivered to government at twenty per cent. below the market price, which is ascertained by appraisement on the spot, the necessary advances being of course first made to the miners by government. The small stones are sold at Pontianak, and the large ones, for which there are no purchasers there, are disposed of at Batavia, and the profits equally divided between government and the Panambahan. There is every reason to believe that in the first year and a half succeeding this arrangement, which was made in the middle of 1823, these amounted to about 19,000 guldens. 390 carats having been delivered to the agents of government in the latter part of 1823, and 1,900 in 1824, the cost of which must have been 33,000 guldens, and the proceeds 52,000. The existing regulations are no doubt as often evaded as that mentioned above must have been, and if such be the case, 2,290 carats are less than the actual produce of the period in question. The number of persons employed during it is unknown, so that no idea can be formed of the profit on mining speculations.* The deliveries of 1825 and 1826 were less than that of 1824, and will be still less this year, government not advancing to an equal extent, in consequence partly of an outstanding balance against the miners, and partly of the disinclination of the latter to receive copper money. Some natives are of opinion that the veins are not so productive as in former times; others, making due allowance for the decrease occasioned by the measures of government, say that they are not worked with equal zeal.

Gold is found in almost every part of the residency, also in the areng strata, and takes many names, being invariably designated by the name of the place where it is procured. The gold of Sintang, Sangão, and Landak, are about nine touch; of Muntuhari about eight and and a half; that of Mandor a shade below eight; these are places under Pontianak: that found at Mantradu, under Mompawa, is about eight touch; and under Sambas, gold of nine touch is found; at Sapan, of eight and a half; at Larak, of eight; and of seven and a half at Salakāo. The mines are worked in a similar manner to those already described, and the areng cleaned in the dulan, in the centre of which the gold, from its greater gravity, is collected. There are no data for ascertaining the amount produced, or the number of persons employed.

The grandson of Haji Mahomet Sally once expended between 500 and 600 dollars in employing thirty-six men nearly five months, and was unsuccessful, and says that he has known other persons porsessed of greater means disburse treble that amount without success.

† The amount of gold produced is supposed to be about 14 pikuls, or 3,000 bungkals.

The price at the principal ports may be taken at about two dollars and ninety cents per touch; or say, twenty-six Spanish dollars for Sintang gold of nine touch. The sultaun of Sambas has in his possession a lump weighing twelve and a half bungkals, and says he has seen some which weighed twenty-five.

Iron is principally procured from Jellè, in the interior of Matan, in sufficient quantities to form an article of export, when it is known by the name of bissi ikat, from the manner in which it is made up. Ten pieces, each piece about eight or nine inches long, one and a half broad, and half an inch thick, form a small bundle, and five of these a large one, which weighs about nineteen or twenty catties, and sells at Matan for about three dollars. It is collected by the Daya, and is of superior quality, as tools made of it are not steeled, and it is in great demand among the natives. It is imported advantageously at Pontianak, both from Matan and from Banjermassin, at which place it is known by the name of bissi desa, or country iron.

The animal productions, which add to the exports of this residency, are wax, bezoar stones, and deer horns; but very little birds'-nest is found. The wax is of good quality when collected by the Daya, who find the hives most commonly on the katapan tree;* but, passing through many hands before exported, it is then generally adulterated.+ The bezoar stones, or batu galiga, the Daya allege, are collected by them from the muscular parts of animals. particularly the porcupine (Landak), and the various species of Simia, and they conceive that they are produced by wounds received from other animals, especially the wild hog and Simia, On the coast, this account appears to be believed, although contrary to the received opinion that the bezoar is produced in the stomachs of certain ruminating animals.

No meteorological journal has been kept, but, to judge from personal feeling, the climate must be very warm-this, with the dense forests, and extensive marshes, would warrant the inference that the residency is unhealthy, but it is considered otherwise, with the exception of the diamond district. The prevalent diseases are diarrhea, dysentery, remittent and intermittent fevers, dropsical, rheumatic and bilious complaints, small pox, and the lues venerea. While the cholera morbus raged, it made dreadful ravages. Once at Pontianak, the whole garrison were attacked, and the resident, who fortunately escaped, was the only person to administer the usual remedies.

It cannot be expected that the local authorities should have been able to draw up a census of the population, when it is remembered that the most numerous portion are either independent savages, or Chinese in open revolt; but it is probable that the whole population of this extensive tract does not exceed 400,000 souls.

The most numerous class are the Daya, who may be estimated at 200,000. They are principally employed in collecting the useful products of their forests, mining, and the cultivation of their ladangs. A small strip of coarse cotton cloth (barely sufficient to cover those parts nature teaches them to conceal) called a chawat, which is often made of bark, and sometimes a kind of waistcoat, and head handkerchief, form their dress; beads and brass wire their ornaments, salt their luxury, tobacco their passion, and iron is necessary for their tools and arms. These articles are taken to them from the lower parts of the rivers, and from the mode in which the inland trade is conducted, the consumer pays enormously for them in the produce of his industry; for instance, in some places one measure of salt costs twenty of rice. The Dava are, generally speaking, peaceable; the petty feuds among themselves may be traced to the horrid custom of ornamenting their houses with human skulls, procured by waylaying individuals of a different tribe, and to decorating their children with the teeth; or to disputes about particular tracts of forests: and the oppression of the Chinese sometimes rouses them to revenge themselves against that race. It is considered more honourable that the skulls should be those of women or children, on the supposition that the men would exert themselves for their protection; but it is seldom they are procured by open attack; the general practice, when operations are carried on to a considerable extent, being to surround a village during the night, and murder those who have occasion to leave it at break of day. Some of those who are found about the ports to the northward of Sambas, at times connect themselves with the pirates, and the condition of the connexion is, that the skulls and iron shall be their share, the other plunder that of the pirates.

* Those trees attain a great age, and, when growing near a village, become hereditaments, having been known to have been in the possession of the same family for three and four generations. † In 1821, an American ship purchased seventy-two pikuls at Pontianak, which realized much less than the prime cost, the wax was so greatly adulterated.

‡ The best are procured from the porcupine, and in the district of Landak.

The villages of these savages are mostly placed near spots fit for their ladangs, and are generally protected by a beinting or breastwork. The houses are built with a long verandah in front, which serves for communicating with the different families and for their several fire-places. There are mostly three ladders, which are pulled up at night. From six to seven families reside in one house, the patriarch in the middle, in whose apartment the musical instruments are kept. The houses are built upon posts, and in the space below the pigs. &c. are reared. Among the customs peculiar to them, it may be expected that something respecting the decapitation of heads should be mentioned. The more heads a man has cut off the more he is respected, and a young man cannot marry until he can produce heads procured by himself. nor can the corpse of a person of rank be inhumed until a fresh head be acquired by his nearest of kin. Should he be of high rank, great rejoicings take place on his return from a successful expedition; the heads, which probaby still bleed, are seized by the women, who rush into the water, dip the heads and anoint themselves with the ensanguined water which drops from the skulls. A man of great consideration may have fifty or sixty skulls suspended in his premises. It has been known that two years have expired before a young man could be married, or, in other words, before he could procure a skull. The following are the customs observed on the conclusion of peace between two hostile tribes. Each provides a slave to be murdered by the other, and the principal person present gives the first wound, which is inflicted on the lower part and in the centre of the breast bone. The other persons of the tribe who may be present immediately follow the example, and fathers encourage their children to mutilate the body with their knives or whatever weapon they can acquire. The slaves sacrificed to peace are not criminals, but generally purchased for this purpose. Besides this, presents are interchanged; these are provisions, gold dust to the value of a few rupees, and Siamese earthen jars, which are highly valued, as the priests use them as oracles, striking them, and predicting according to the sounds which may be elicited. Peace is concluded at the chief village or town of the most powerful tribe. It was thus that a feud which had existed five years between the Sintang and Săkādō Daya was determined in 1826, since when they have been on amicable terms. The principal Daya are those of Kayang, whose principal town is Sěgão, which is about twenty-five days' journey by water above Sintang, and the latter is about fourteen inland from Pontianak. Sevendifferent dialects are known to exist among the Daya of this presidency. Far in the interior the only trace of religion appears to be in a superstitious reverence paid to deer, which are considered to be the progenitors of the Daya, and this animal is therefore not killed or eaten by them. The high cast Daya do not engage in mining, as they fancy it may induce misfortune on their country.

The next most numerous class are the Chinese; some rate them at no more than 35,000 men, others as high as 72,000; probably 50,000 may be near the amount, and, as the greater number are not married, nor have children, the total number of Chinese, men, women, and children, may be about 125,000. Their principal establishments are at Mandor, Mantradu, Salakao, Larak, and Sinkawan, in the interior; but the whole coast, from the river of Sambas to Pontianak is lined with their establishments. Their towns are described as populous and well laid out. They are principally emigrants from that part of the province of Kuang-tong, whose inhabitants are known in the straits by the appellation of Orang Khé, or their descendants by Daya women. Formerly, about 3,000 arrived annually; of late, in consequence of the disturbances, not more than a third of that number. They are described as turbulent, and difficult to govern; but may not this be attributed to the change they have experienced between the present and the former governments? The only direct tax under the native government was a small tribute or bungamas, collected from those who had a certain employment; now, all, whether employed or not, are expected to pay two guldens for a license to settle, an annual capitation tax of the same amount per head, to contribute to the support of various farms during their stay, and, finally, thirty guldens for permission to quit the country. These impositions on the most valuable part of the community, a class who know their own value and strength, naturally render them dissatisfied; yet, notwithstanding such just cause for dissatisfaction, there seems no doubt that the views of government might have been accomplished had these been gradually carried into execution in a mild and consistent manner, and not, at one time by threats, at another by negociation, and then again by force. The most probable mode of deriving a revenue from them appears to be by a transit duty on the articles of their consumption, leaving the internal regulation of their settlements to themselves; and by requiring an assessment from each establishment in proportion to its population, to be levied by the kongsies, or chiefs. To an arrangement of this description they would have no objection. The men and women are clothed in the costume of China, their apparel being made of coarse blue and white piece goods; besides these, however, they require a few kurwahs, for sacrifices; and they consume opium, Chinese and Javanese tobacco, pulse (kachang), coco-nut oil, iron, and a few articles from China. They are employed in mining, agriculture, manufacturing coarse sugar; those near the sea in fishing; and, in the principal ports, as artificers and petty merchants.

The Malayu are estimated at about 60,000 souls. The men are variously employed as foresters, agriculturists, miners, or, in maritime pursuits.

The Ugi men, women, and children, may be 5,000 in number; the greater part settled at Pontianak. They are mostly from Waju, in the interior of Celebes; and among them are individuals possessed of 80,000 or 90,000 dollars. The trade of Pontianak is principally in their hands, and they are only second to the Chinese, as a valuable portion of the community.

There are a few Arabs and their descendants, whose number may be taken at 600; of natives of India there cannot be more than fifty.

In addition to the articles mentioned as consumed by the Daya and Chinese, the Malayu, Ugi, and Arabs, require a few finer Indian and European piece goods, Celebean and Javanese ditto, raw silk and manufactured silks, and a little broad cloth.

Agriculture affords but little to pay for these articles. Rice, indeed, is sometimes exported, but it is a query whether more be produced than sufficient for home consumption, as, at times, it forms an article of import. It is cultivated both in the ladang or upland plantations, and in the sawah or marsh lands; in the former by the Daya, in the latter by the Chinese. The ladange are permitted to lie fallow three years; the growing jungle has then attained sufficient size to afford the necessary manure when cut down and burnt. Both ladang and sawah plantations are considered moderately productive, but, in some seasons, the growing crops suffer much from vermin. Sugar manufactured by the Chinese, from cane cultivated by themselves, is also exported, but in very small quantities.

From the foregoing brief notices of the productions of this residency and the wants of the inhabitants, it will be perceived that the imports are opium, piece goods, iron, tobacco, salt, silk (raw and manufactured), pulse, oil, and a few Chinese goods; the principal returns for which are gold, diamonds, wax, rattans, dammer, wood, and Tankawan oils, with a little rice and coarse sugar.

This trade is principally in the hands of the Ugi, who either conduct it in their own craft, or deal with trading vessels touching at the ports; the Arabs and Malayu participate, and the trade with China is carried on in the junks which annually arrive, to the number of perhaps six. It is asserted that commerce is much on the decline; and this is attributed to the following causes: to the eastward the imports are similar to those of these ports, and formerly Sambas, Mompawa, and Pontianak, were emporia for part of the eastern trade; this branch of course has ceased since the establishment of Singapore: and the remaining branch, or that which supplies the wants of the residency. has suffered from the disturbances having taught the Chinese to depend less upon foreign supplies. Again; the duties which are levied are much greater than in former times; and as the consequent enhancement in the price of goods, from this and other fiscal regulations, is not understood by the Daya, they do not purchase to an equal amount, and of course have not equal inducements to industrious pursuits. The introduction also of copper money, and that at an increased valuation, has tended to paralyze industry, or, in other words, to decrease trade.

With the decrease of trade the revenue has decreased; it now amounts to about 9,000 guldens per mensem, and is derived from the capitation tax on the Chinese, a fee for permitting them to settle, one for a license to quit the country, pork, fish, arrack, prepared opium, Chinese gambling, and betel farms, the profits arising from the monopoly of the diamonds, post office and vendue departments, harbour dues, customs, stamps, and a tax on the transfer of property.

The current expenses of the residency, excluding the interest on those of the wars with the Chinese, and on the dead stock, may be estimated at 45,000 guldens; from this, the average revenue being deducted, it would appear that government sustains an actual monthly loss of 34,000 guldens in keeping up this residency.

Have any of the objects of government in forming these outposts been realized in any degree sufficient to counterbalance this enormous expense? Truth requires a negative reply to this question.

Commerce

Commerce is one of the principal means appointed by Providence for civilizing mankind, and is the only one which has hitherto operated in partially civilizing those Daya who are not equally savage with their brethren. The inland trade is notoriously less than heretofore, and therefore it is not uncharitable to conclude that the Daya are generally as barbarous as when the Netherlands commenced administering the government. The pirates established to the northward of Sambas, and those of Kayong, in the interior of Matang, commit as many depredations as ever, and in as daring a manner. The state of the revenue has been shewn; and the small trade carried on with Java and its dependencies cannot be considered as securing any peculiar commercial advantages, as the few articles imported from these parts would have been introduced had the European power not been established. A mistaken line of policy can be the only cause of the failure.

DESCRIPTION OF BABYLON.

From a Spanish Poem, 1280.*

It standes in a salubrious spot, wele planted, in a clyme Nor mistye with the vernal rayne, nor chilled by wynter ryme; In all riche bounties bountifull beyonde desyre, and Tyme Has with the gyftes of mony an age still stored it from his pryme. The folke that in that citye bide wan sickenesse hurteth ne'er: There the choice gummes and balsames be, and spice beyonde compare: Of ginger, frankincense and myrrhe the place is nothing spare, Nor of the nuttemeg, nor the clove, nor spikenard moche more rare. The verie treen give odours forth soe swete that they dispell Or strippe disease of all its force; the people there that dwelle' Are of a ryght gode tynte, and men may soothlie swear that well The tribes that jorneye farre and neare perceyve the plesaunt smelle. And founded on a spacious plaine, most plesaunt was the site, Riche in all kyndes of game wherein the hunter takes delyte : By verdaunt mountaynes compassed round, by nibbling flockes made whyte, Well tempered passed the vernal daye and eke the wynter nighte, There fly the brilliaunt loorie and the curious paroqueete That somtimes even men of brayne with their sage conynge beat; And when the lesser birdes too sing, the motheres, wele I weet, Forget their own dere babies in lystening soundes soe swete. The men are men of substaunce, and generous in their pryde; They all goe robed in garments with goodlie colours dyed; Caparisoned sleeke palfries and ambling mules they ryde, And the poore in satyn and in silke goe marchyng at their side. Built by a rare gode master were the palaces soe vaste, Wele mesured by the quadrante and the tymbers morticed fast; With mervellous care and labour were the deep foundacyons caste, Stronge to withstande the fyre and floode, the erthquake and the blaste. The gates were all of marble, natyve marble pure and whyte, All shyning like fync cristal, and brave as they were brighte With sculptured werke; the quarter that soared to greatest height Was the Kynge's own home, and kyngly it might be termed of ryghte. Four hundred columns had they, those mansions every one, With base and capital of goolde, reflecting backe the sunne; Had they been polished brasiers they colde not more have shone, Their partes so welle the chizel and burnisher had done. There is not in the worlde a man that fytlie can declare The perfect sweetnesse and delight that filled all places there; For whilst in that fair Eden a mortal lived, he ne'er Felt hunger or the parchinge thirst, or paine, or vexing care.

* By Juan Lorenzo of Astorga. See the article "Castilian Poetry," in the Foreign Review and Continental Miscellany, No. 1.

THE SCHOOL-BOOK SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

A VERY severe, and we are apprehensive not altogether unjust, criticism upon one of the elementary books translated and published under the auspices of the Calcutta School-Book Society, appears in the last number of the Paris Journal Asiatique. This critical article bears the signature of P. L. du Chaume: but for that circumstance we should have been tempted, by its internal evidence, to bestow the credit of it upon another individual.

The writer begins by the following remarks, which indicate a view of the present mode of instructing our Hindu subjects, which though not perhaps quite original, has been seldom if ever avowed in this country. " Amongst. the numerous societies," he observes, "more or less useful, formed by the English in India for the dissemination of European knowledge and civilization. one of the most active is the Calcutta School-Book Society. Its chief object is that of publishing elementary works for the use of the native schools throughout the country. This object, which appears laudable in itself, presents serious inconveniences in practice, and gives great scope for remark upon the motives and results of the undertaking. It is desired to instruct the Hindus in our sciences, and to inculcate upon them European notions, without reflecting upon the unavoidable consequences of these endeavours. This new civilization will destroy amongst the Hindus the ties which bind them to their country, to their countrymen, and to their brethren in religious faith; it would appear that this fact had been lost sight of, namely, that such a change would render those who adopted it aliens from their family, and what in India is still worse, from their caste. Without becoming Europeans, they would be no longer Hindus: without laws, country, or family connexions, they would be placed in the most deplorable condition."-The writer hence appears to recommend that the Hindu people should be kept in ignorance, or, which is pretty nearly the same thing, confined to the study of their own books.

After these introductory observations, the author proceeds to classify the several modes of civilization amongst large masses of mankind. "There exists throughout the world," he remarks, "four great species of civilization, materially different from each other; that of Europe, founded upon Christian ethics and the traditions of classical antiquity; the Indian, which is entirely religious and metaphysical; that of China, founded solely upon policy; and, finally, the Mahomedan, the most modern and the least commendable, which rests upon an extravagant creed, admitting the gloomy principle of fatalism, destructive of all human society when its votaries become really converts to it. These four species of civilization cannot be confounded or blended with each other; they would be mutually destroyed by any attempt to unite them. That which was the strongest in a country where another species endeavoured to insinuate itself, would in the end gain the victory over the latter, as was the case in China, where one branch of Indian civilization, the Buddhistic, was introduced a short time after our era; or as in India, when that country was invaded by a handful of Mahomedans, whose creed and institutions were soon neutralized by those of the conquered, who composed a mass too vast and too homogeneous to be easily swayed or altered by foreign influence."

The French writer subjoins the following reflections, which demonstrate how little he is acquainted with the real sentiments of the natives of India:—
"The English, who aim at teaching the Hindus the paces of Europeans, do not perceive that, by this mistaken zeal, they pave the way for two events which cannot fail of being fatal to them. One is the formation of a new power, which, which, in time, will succeed in expelling them from India; the other is provoking the hatred of the natives, which they must naturally excite in a very high degree, by openly sapping their creed and ancient institutions." He concludes this part of his criticism with the following liberal remark:—"Happily for the East-India Company, the instruments employed to introduce European civilization amongst the Hindus are not selected with such care us to offer a prospect of this undertaking being very speedily accomplished. The missionaries, who betake themselves to the banks of the Ganges, are not all of them apostles endowed with an austere virtue and an irresistible eloquence; and the teachers, destined to diffuse light and knowledge throughout these remote countries, do not appear to combine all the qualities which seem requisite in order to ensure success to so great a project."

The critic then proceeds to examine an epitome of geography in Hindustani printed at Calcutta in 1824 by the School-Book Society, which he characterizes as one of the most miserable productions in this department of science which could possibly be met with. He begins his criticism with objecting to the introduction of the English words "Calcutta School-Book Society" in Arabic characters, instead of being translated into the corresponding terms in Hindi; and with remarking that the treatise, which is drawn up in the form of question and answer, is preceded by no introduction; and that, although the title professes to give a description of all the earth, the author confines himself exclusively to Asia.

Comparing the answers to questions in p. 10 and p. 12 of this treatise, the French critic shews that the translator has confounded the word bahhr, "the sea," with bohr, "a canal;" consequently the native pupil is misled.

The next hallucination we shall give in the French critic's words: "At the question: 'What are the parts of Asia?' one is astonished to find, at p. 20, the following answer: 'The country of Russia (روشيا) and that of the Tartars are to the north; the country of Tibet is in the middle; that of the Arabs and Turkestan are to the west; Hindustan is to the south; and the country of the Birmans and China are to the cast.' The author, therefore, places Russia in Asia; and moreover, he does not know that the orientals call that country not وروسيا, Russia, like the English, but وروسيا, Russia, like the English, but ما المواقع (Oorcos. He also supposes that all the middle part of Asia is occupied by Tibet; and this, in fact, appears to be the settled opinion of his countrymen who reside in India. In an official document relative to the examination of the pupils in the college of Fort William * (in June 1823), we find the following passage in support of this opinion:

'The country where the Bhote (or Tibet) language is spoken, is the only one which hes between the British dominions and those of Russia; to which may be added the great probability, or rather certainty, that this is the current language of the whole of Chinese Tartary.'

"The scholars of Calcutta were therefore ignorant in 1823 of the existence of Little Bucharia, where Turkish and Persian are spoken, and of Dzungaria, where the Calmuc is the native tongue; for it is necessary to pass through Tibet and these two countries in order to reach the frontiers of Siberia from India. These same scholars had as little notion of the Mongol and of the Manshoo, the only dialects of Eastern Tartary! It is not without reason that Messrs. Abel-Rémusat and Klaproth have exposed these strange blunders blunders of the English at Calcutta. These indiscreet disclosures have, however, excited the bile of the Calcutta Government Gazette; this journal summons to its aid the Hungarian De Koros, the only Englishman (sic) who understands the Tibetan tongue, and declares, upon his authority, that all which Messrs. Rémusat and Klaproth have published upon the language of Tibet is 'altogether erroneous.'* But to return to our 'School-Book man,'+ he terms Turkey, Turkestan, being ignorant that this name belongs only to countries situated beyond the Caspian Sea, and that the empire of the Sultan of Constantinople bears, throughout the East, that of Sultaneti-Othmanieh. In enumerating the great countries of Asia, the 'School-Book man' forgets Persia in the west, and Siam, Cochin China, China, and Japan in the east.'

* The critic quotes, or rather misquotes, the passage from this journal, vol. xvii. p. 85.

After pointing out several omissions and objectionable modes of translation, such as the retention of the English word school, instead of the Hindustani maktab, or maktab khaneh, and the words Church Missionary Society printed in Arabic characters (in neither of which do we find any thing very culpable), the critic quotes the following as a table, given in p. 22 of the book, of the various people and nations of Asia.

1st. The country of the great Tartars, comprehending the Chinese Tartars, the independent Tartars, and Tibet.

2d. The country of Turkestan, containing Natolia, Turcomania, Georgia, Curdistan, Diarbekr, Irak Arabi, the country of Syria, and that of the Philistines or the Holy Land.

3d. The country of Irak.

4th. Persia.

5th. The country of Hind, or Hindustan, which is to the west of the Ganges.

6th. India under the dominion of the English.

7th. India to the eastward of the Ganges, which includes Ava, Aracan, Pegu, Malacca, Assam, and Syria (Sham).

8th. The empire of Tonkin, which consists of Tonkin, Cochin-China, Cambogia, Lakto and Chiampa.

9th. China.

10th. Japan.

"In this exposition, the author has omitted all Siberia, Great and Little Bucharia, Afghanistan, Dzungaria, the country of the Manshoos, Corea, and the kingdom of Lew-kew. He terms Georgia improperly المجازة المجا

In the latter example the critic reveals his own ignorance that there is a country called Sham, or Laos, tributary to the Burmese empire, and independent of Siam.

The critic further observes that the author has converted the kingdom of Cochin

Cochin China into the empire of Tonkin, though the latter is merely a province of the former; and that Japan is not written جاپان in Hindustani, as in this translation, but جيون

The desire of retaining in this work the European names of countries, towns, mountains, and rivers, is severely condemned by the French critic, who considers that it is calculated to render the book useless to Asiatics. He instances the following example: "Astrakan is a populous city on the river Volga, fifty miles from the Caspian Sca;" which ought, in his opinion, to be given thus: "Haji Tarkhan is a populous city on the river Atel, twelve coss (or twenty-three miles, its actual distance,) from the sea of the Khazars:" the Caspian Sea being so called in Asia.

The answer to the question, "with what kingdoms do the Japanese trade?" is the following: "With the English, the Chinese, and the Coreans." The critic remarks, with justice, that "it is perfectly well known that the Japanese admit no English vessels into their ports, and that all the efforts of the East-India Company to establish commercial relations with Japan have completely failed."

Although there is some hypercriticism in this article, and it discovers an uncandid and uncharitable spirit, which seems to be the offspring of dissembled resentment, we must acknowledge our conviction, as far as we can be convinced by an cx-parte consideration of the subject, not having examined the work which is criticised, that some of the writer's objections are well-founded.

SONG OF JAYA DEVA.

(From the Sanskrit.)

SEF, onward trips the laughing Spring, Clad in the vestments of a king, Led by the merriest god above,
The laughing deity of Love,—
His curious bow of blossoms made, Its string, of bees in clusters laid Upon the flowers, whose honied joys
Suspend their motion and their noise;
The arrows of the smiling god
Formed of the fragrant mango-pod

How sweet the gales that gently blow, Cooled by Himála's crest of snow, And breathe of aromatic clove! Whilst in the thickets of the grove, Mixed with the murmurs of the bee, Is heard the cuckoo's minstrelsy.

Who feels not, amidst scenes like these,
The influence of the vernal breeze?
Alas! they feel it not, who weep
Dear objects sunk in mortal sleep.
The lover mourning his departed fair,
Or the sole relict of a wedded pair.

ON THE CONSTITUTIONS BEST SUITED TO THE CLIMATE OF INDIA.

By Whitelaw Ainslie, M.D., M.R.A.S., late of the Medical Staff of Southern India.*

At this period, when there appears to be an intention of recruiting our European military force in India to a considerable extent, it must be worthy of consideration, what description of men may be best fitted to endure the influence of a climate so essentially different from that of the mother country; and which, though for particular ailments it may prove a perfect balm and restorative, is, in other affections, often productive of the most baneful consequences.

I have not seldom been induced to think, that such officers as were emploved in enlisting for the Honourable Company's service, did not sufficiently consider what might be the most proper time of life to prefer; for although a young man of seventeen, well grown, and healthy, may, in his own country, where all is natural to him, easily enough bear the heat of the dog-days, the fatigue of a long march, and the pains of hunger and thirst, vet. if conveyed to a hot climate, at the same early period, the case must alter much; the scorching winds of India, the damps at some seasous, with the peculiar ills which they never fail to bring along with them, are trying enough, in all conscience, to the most robust and best inured; how much more so then must they be to the juvenile and perhaps delicate, whose frames have not yet attained to that degree of vigour which can only be looked for at a certain degree of manhood! Many poor boys, during my long residence in India, have I seen fall victims to the injudicious practice of early enlisting for service in the torrid zone; striplings who, had they been permitted to remain but three years longer in England, might have grown up into hardy men, and been able to endure the severities and vicissitudes of any climate in the world; to say nothing of the bad consequences which inevitably spring from those indiscretions into which the inexperienced are often hurried soon after their arrival in India. It is difficult to conceive a more helpless or miserable being, than a raw lad during his first severe indisposition in that country; it is then he begins most sincerely to regret the want of his family and friends. It is true that the glow of health, and the vivacity of youth, are rendered infinitely more vivid and buoyant by the brilliant sunshine and exhilarating air of an Asiatic clime; but let disease and languor once assail an individual so circumstanced, the fair illusion soon vanishes; he looks around, but finds no wellknown face to cheer him; he considers himself as desolate and abandoned; and not rarely sinks into that state of mental depression, which is of all things the most likely to aggravate his complaint. Such are a few of the mischiefs arising from giving the bounty to youths intended for our eastern territories before their constitutions are fully formed; and, in support of what I have advanced, I shall here notice what has been adduced by Mr. Ballingall, in his excellent Practical Observations on Fever, Dysentery, &c. That gentleman observes (page 13): "from an inspection of the tables exhibiting an abstract of the register of deaths in the second battalion of the Royals, it will appear that during the first first year of the regiment being in India, out of 206 sufferers, 160, or upwards of three-fourths, were under twenty-five years of age."

* This paper contains the substance of a letter which was transmitted, a few years ago, to the Hon-Court of Directors, with many additional remarks.

Earlier than twenty-one, no soldier should, in my opinion, be permitted to proceed to our possessions in the cast; but, as there may be an impropriety in sending out recruits to a tropical region too soon in life, so there may be an equal impropriety in sending them out at too late a period. The habits of the animal economy, like other habits, once established, cannot be easily or safely altered; none of the great organs of the human body, preparing or circulating for a length of years, with a certain energy, a specific quantum of any fluid, can be forced, by a sudden power, to do more or less, without inducing some degree of variation in their constituent parts, if not producing in them an actually morbid condition: the same may be said of the different smaller glands and emunctories, all of which are in some measure affected by a change of climate. With the exception of that rapid alteration caused by death, or acute disease, on the human frame, there is perhaps none so great as that brought on by a removal from a cold to a torrid region; and in so far as we are beings* by constitution, colour, and in fact by our very nature, intended for a temperate air, so far is the experiment we make, in venturing to feverish climes, attended with more or less ultimate danger. Yet, however great the revolution which takes place upon our coming into a highly heated atmosphere, so admirably are we organized, so nobly fitted for all the purposes of life, that, with proper care, and at a proper age, little risk is incurred. If nast the age of thirty-six, I should object to any soldier being embarked for an Indian settlement, unless, indeed, he has been seasoned to a hot climate in other parts of the world; and at that age it could only be with safety allowed m his Majesty's regiments, which consist in general of disciplined men, who, of course, do not undergo the same severe drilling that recruits for the Hon. Company's service are obliged to submit to, soon after landing, and than which nothing can be more trying to new comers. I should, therefore, recommend, that in enlisting, either for his Majesty's or the Company's service in India, a preference should be given to those of an age included between twenty-one and thirty-six.

It must be remembered, however, that these observations apply merely to soldiers, or people whose condition in life does not admit of their procuring the comforts and indulgencies which the more affluent can command; individuals of this description are often, in time of war, not many days disembarked, before they are under the necessity of marching from morning till night, at a season of the year, perhaps, when the thermometer may be as high as 80° or 90° in the shade at noon; of sleeping on the damp ground, and rising, halfrefreshed, to toil on through an unhealthy district, perchance to encounter the enemy: I say in time of war, for at other times, when stern necessity does not render it indispensable, it must be allowed that the different Governments of India invariably evince the most humane consideration for their young soldiers on their first arrival. The King's and Company's officers, and the civil servants, feel few of the inconveniences which I have just mentioned; their means admit of their taking better care of themselves; carried about in palanqueens during the hot hours, for the first few months they are in the country, neither exposed to great fatigue, nor to the noxious dews of the night, they get gradually habituated to the fervid atmosphere, so that, in due time, they become able to endure all weathers without peril. With such advantages advantages those gentlemen might safely venture to India at an earlier period of life; I do not think for them that nineteen would be too young. How far, indeed, this might interfere with education, is another matter; the object is of great importance; I merely speak of the physical influence of climate.* As those of a superior rank might, without risk, embark sooner than people of inferior stations, so might they, for similar reasons, with greater safety visit Asia at a more advanced age. As a proof of this, have we not often seen governors, judges, and commanders-in-chief, who were even in the decline of life before they stept on an Indian soil; who were never before in the torrid zone; yet who enjoyed excellent health and spirits, in a country which to them must have been like a new world?

I shall now proceed to say a few words regarding the description of men. in point of natural constitution, best fitted for the purpose in question. Taking it for granted that the recruits are, in the first place, examined from head to foot, in order to ascertain the external perfection of their frames, and their facility in performing all muscular motions, I should think it advisable, considering the nature of the country for which they were destined, that particular attention was paid to them in other respects. It is to be presumed, that any person who has made accurate observations on the different appearances, even in aspect alone, betwixt sound health and latent disease, could readily distinguish such as should from such as should not be engaged: a vivid colour, animated look, firm step and voice, clean tongue, and inoffensive breath, with what is commonly called the white of the eye (tunica adnata) clear, and without the least yellow tinge, are in general very sufficient proofs of good digestion and well-performed visceral secretions; + and, with the other requisites. may, with propriety, entitle the possessor to a passport for the plains of Hindoostan; on the other hand, young men who seem dull, sallow, with rather tumid bellies, and somewhat bloated countenances, whose movements are languid, and the white of whose eyes has a yellowish or suffused appearance. ought to meet with a decided refusal to any application for bounty for the Company's service, let them be ever so well grown; for in them most certainly lurk the seeds of future calamity;—a calamity which will assuredly burst forth if ever they are exposed to ardent heat in a tropical country. A predisposition to hepatic derangement, and consequent visceral obstruction, may not unfrequently be discovered very early in life, and should never fail, when detected, to excite a due caution in the medical officers who are anpointed to examine recruits for our armies in the east. By a rigid observance of these particulars, not only might our European force in that quarter be rendered more certainly healthy, but many fine fellows kept at home for the defence of the parent state, who would otherwise, in all probability, fall victims to the maladies of a climate to which their peculiar constitutions render them obnoxious.

In making the foregoing remarks, I have chiefly had in view the troops of that service to which I for many years belonged; they are equally applicable, however, to his Majesty's regiments, as may be seen by turning to the valuable publication above-mentioned, in which Mr. Ballingall grieves at the error so frequently fallen into, of selecting boys for the King's service in the East-Indies; but I should be inclined to extend the view of this subject still farther, and suggest, influenced equally by the common feelings of humanity and a just regard for the public purse, that when whole corps are ordered to any part of our Eastern dominions, they should previously undergo the most minute examination, and that all such individuals as, from their habit of body or otherwise, seemed likely to suffer from the hot climate, should be detained in Eurone, and others substituted in their place.

 $\bullet$  The reader will find some valuable remarks on climate in the work lately given to the world by Mi-Annesley, On the Diseases of India.

† See Maclury on the Bile, pp. 196-204.

The impropriety of sending men to India who are subject to epilepsy, must at once appear obvious, when it is considered how great the languor and exhaustion, which but too frequently oppress even the healthiest within the tropics, and which never fail to prove more or less injurious, by increasing the mobility of the nervous system; nay, the almost constant irritation from the feeling of heat alone, independent of its other effects, I conceive to be no trifling source of mischief to those who are subject to attacks of the malady just alluded to.

No man should be allowed to enlist for any of our Eastern settlements who has not been previously vaccinated, or had the regular small-pox, for this disorder, if caught naturally in India, is but too often of the confluent and worst kind, and most destructive.

Such individuals as suffer from cutaneous affections, of whatever description, are most improper subjects for the service in India; in a climate where the skin has so much to do, it is absolutely necessary that its condition be healthy, so as to transmit the perspiration with the greatest possible facility; * a principle, it is true, which will hold good in every part of the world, but which is peculiarly applicable to the torrid zone; where a free exudation is so necessary to afford relief during the excessive heat, that it becomes almost as indispensable as the secretion of urine itself.

But it is not in this way only that the enticular discharge proves salutary in tropical countries; it appears to me to be powerfully preventive against various complaints. I have had repeatedly occasion to remark, that such young men as had suffered from dyspensia in England, found their health much improved on coming to the Coromandel Coast, which I could account for in no other way than by the almost constant moisture on the surface of the body which is there experienced: for it is a fact well established, that in using exercise as a remedy in cases of bad digestion, in Europe, little benefit is ever derived if it is not employed in a way to bring on a degree of sweating. All extremes, however, are bad; should this be excessive, or allowed too often to take place, the very reverse will ensue; languor, general weakness in the first passages, and that most certain of all consequences of violent perspirations, constipation, when much crude matter is pent up, when bile is obstructed in its natural course, heating, and ultimately inflaming various organs, the healthy state of which+ is essentially necessary for any thing like comfort or salubrity in the Eastern world. I have said that, generally speaking, the climate of our Asiatic dominions is far from hostile to the dyspeptic. It is still less so, if they are at the same time cautious with regard to their diet. Even the most robust frequently find their stomachs weakened by a want of due attention to their mode of living; what, then, must the delicate hazard by the same inadvertency? and it must be confessed that, for the higher orders in India, there are many temptations, for new comers especially, to exceed, found, as they must often be, at the tables of the affluent and luxurious. Certain mixtures of food cannot be made without the danger* of bringing on indigestion; hence follows a badly prepared chyle, which will not only prove detrimental by insufficiently nourishing the body, but will lay the seeds of different chronic disorders. Thus it is that we see at our various watering-places hundreds of martyrs to gout, gravel, and rheumatism, many of them reaping the fruits of years of irregularity; men too, not unusually at a time of life in which, had they been more prudent, they might have been enjoying the most perfect health. How does it happen, said an intelligent Frenchman once to the writer of this paper. that such numbers of your countrymen grow so early in life infirm? He did not think it necessary in reply to say all he thought on the occasion, but as the foreigner was a person of great observation, it is presumed that he guessed sufficiently correctly as to the real cause. Soldiers in India have it not in their power greatly to err, either in quantity or quality of food; happily for them. their mess-regulations fix all these matters; the consequence is, that amongst them dyspepsia is not of frequent occurrence; their maladies arising chiefly from great exposure to ardent heat, the abuse of spirituous liquors, and intercourse with dissolute females. It is no place here to treat medically of indigestion in India, yet I trust that it may not be reckoned as irrelevant to add. in consideration of the good-will we bear to all young Eastern adventurers, that those who wish to avoid it, would do wisely to live on the plainest food, which should be well done; to dine, if possible, on one dish, or two at most; not to take more than two meals in the day, the second certainly not sooner than five or six hours after the first; not to be afraid of black tea, for it is virtually stomachic; to masticate sufficiently; to shun crude vegetables or fruits; to give a preference to that liquor, in moderation, which is the least apt to produce acidity, whether sherry or brandy and water; not to expose themselves to great heat, more than duty requires; to sleep with the head high; to take care that the bowels are kept regularly open; and, if their situation renders it convenient, to use regular equitation; in the cool of the morning; in a word, to have this ever in view, so to manage themselves, according to the best of their means, as to eschew, if possible, those disorders, whether hepatic or otherwise, which require mercury for their removal, the frequent use of which is the ruin of a greater number of fine constitutions than I shall here venture to state, and, in Hindoostan, in the hands of injudicious men, is tenfold more destructive than the sword itself.

* It therefore becomes a serious consideration, in individuals destined for India, to ascertain whether the extreme vessels admit of free exudation; as, if they do not, much bad health frequently

† So occasioning morbid affections of the liver, spleen, bowels, &c.

What the gouty, or those who have any reason to expect a visit from the gout, have to dread or hope from the climate of Hindoostan, comes next to be considered. It has been remarked, that some nations are less liable to this affection than others; Pliny speaks of it as of more frequent occurrence in his

For example, I have known many persons who could not take a single glass of Madeira wine at the same meal with curry or malagatanie, without bringing on heartburn in the course of about four hours after † After what has already been noticed of the mischief done by neglected constipation, it is scarcely necessary to say more; but this I must add, that I never yet knew a bad case of liver or dysentery, in India, that had not been preceded by it. The pill I have found most useful in keeping the bowels open, is the common compound colocynth pill; it never suckens the stomach, nor gripes; perhaps owing to the happy mixture of its component parts: a four-grain pill will usually be found sufficient, taken at beditine, to assist nature; if more is required, three of these will in most instances be effectual: if bile is to be carried off, to the three may then be added three grains of calonnel.

‡ Of all modes of exercise, the most conducive to health in India is riding on horseback; by soft trotting there is a gentle impulse given to the ingesta downwards, as well as to the bile, &c. The mouths of the different ducts are kept open, and a tone and energy produced throughout the whole circulation—so much cannot be said for hard galloping, which over agitates, and never fails to render the nervous still more so.

§ Hist. Nat., leb. xxvi. cap. x.

his time, in Italy, than it was in former ages; and believed it to be of foreign origin, from the circumstance of there being no Latin name for it. The malady is very rare in China; and is said to be little known in some provinces of Germany. In Arabia it is seldom met with, but this does not appear to be the case in Persia, where, amongst those who do not adhere strictly to the rules of the Koran, with respect to temperance, it is by no means uncommon. I do not think that I ever knew but one Hindoo who had a well-marked gout; the Mahometans are not so fortunate in this respect, nor have they any right to be, when we reflect that they are very indolent, live freely, and do not abstain from many other good things of this world. We may be, therefore, from the data before us, authorized to conclude that the climate of our Asiatic territories is favourable to this disorder. Those Europeans who are subject to attacks of it, have, for the most part, long intervals betwixt the fits; and when they do come, they are generally slight. What may be the positive cause of this mildness or unfrequency of the disease in the hot climate must be difficult to say, further than as India proves advantageous to the dyspeptic, it may he equally so to the gouty, seeing that those are constantly the greatest martyrs to it who suffer most from indigestion. Digestion, at all events that part of it which is performed in the stomach, has been called a fermentation, sui generis; if well performed, a wholesome chyle is ultimately produced; provided always that the extraventricular part of the process is also well performed; and which must depend on a due supply of good bile and other good abdominal secretions: but if the chyme, from which the chyle is in the first instance separated, has been rendered corrupt by repletion, or heterogeneous mixtures in the stomach, heart-burn* ensues, which is characterized by an acid of a neculiar nature, and this I conceive to be the prime agent in bringing on both gout and gravel, for they are twin brothers. The admirable Dr. Wollaston has demonstrated that the concretions formed in the joints of gouty persons are composed of an animal acid, termed the uric or lithic acid, and soda; such concretions are no doubt hastened in their produce by frequent indigestions; and certainly the disposition to their production is increased with advancing years, and an over indulgence in fermented liquors. Hereditary ills will assail us in spite of our greatest care to keep them at a distance; it is for those, however, who have such calamities in prospect not totally to despair, but to hold this in remembrance, that as they must have had a commencement in the family, occasioned most likely by imprudence, so may they have a termination there, the reward of persevering moderation. Another cause still may be brought forward in favour of India for the gouty, and that is, the free perspiration there experienced, which, there is every reason to believe, carries off much peccant acid matter.

I have observed that gout and gravel are twin brothers; I shall not, therefore, detain the reader long with suggestions regarding how far the tropical country may be beneficial or otherwise, for such as have occasion to fear the last-mentioued complaint. I have had occasion to attend both Hindoos and Musselmans suffering from gravel or stone, but I cannot say that they are maladies of common occurrence in Hindoostan; on the contrary, they are rare; and as for confirmed stone, in a European habit, I never knew a case of it: the affinity betwixt gout and gravel is no longer questioned; so it consequently often happens that nephritic calculi are a sequel to gout, when it has assumed a chronic a chronic form, and we find that the children of gouty parents are said to be hereditarily disposed to both disorders; some having a podagric and others a nephritic affection. The use of hard water has been supposed, by Dr. Lister to be a powerful cause of gravel; others, again, ascribe more mischief to acid food : were the latter a serious source of the affliction, we should see the Indians suffer more from it than they do, for they use limes, tamarinds, &c. very liherally. But if I cannot allow the natural acids found in fruits* or potherbs to have any essential effect in producing the complaint in question. I must ascribe a very different result to that morbid acid produced in the first passages by indigestion, and which goes, no doubt, to form the lithic acid; so indicating the employment of alkaline remedies in all calculous diseases. But perhaps nothing can be urged more in favour of a hot climate in gravellish complaints than what we find recommended by Dr. Mason Good, who says, that whatever tends to promote a determination to the skin will do good in such ail. ments, "for the skin itself becomes, in this case, an outlet for a discharge of a redundancy of acid."+

* It is sufficiently well known that the best remedies for this are antacids

It has occasionally become a subject of discussion, whether the climate of India was best suited to those of dark or fair complexions; but it does not appear to be a matter of great importance; as the tropics, with proper care. will be found to agree well with either; yet I must remark, that there is a sort of extreme fairness, accompanied with white hair, and very light grey eyes. approaching to those of the Albinos, which is far from desirable in hot countries. Individuals so distinguished not only suffer much in their sight from the glare of bright sunshine, but, being often of lax fibres, they fall into those diseases which such a frame of body is liable to, and invariably get scorched on exposure to a heat from which others sustain no injury; but this must not be understood to apply to what is commonly called fair complexion, but to that almost unnatural whiteness of hair and skin which we sometimes see. There is also a degree of dark complexion which we should not select for India; I mean that which is accompanied with unusual torpor of the bowels, languid circulation, grave manner, full black eyes, and peculiar attachment to abstruse studies-in fact, that by which the melancholic temperament is chiefly characterized. For young men so particularized I should say that India was prejudicial, as the morbid torpor would increase by the wasting influence of great exudation; sobriety of manner pass gradually into a love of seclusion; dyspensia put on some of the distressing features of hypochondriasis; and intellects, frequently of the noblest and most generous cast, though in their reasoning faculty unimpaired, lose, in spite of the gorgeous orb, much of that manly energy which had constituted their principal charm. Upon the whole, I should be inclined to give a preference to complexions neither unusually dark nor peculiarly fair; but after all, as already hinted, it is not an object perhaps worthy of much consideration: and we know that the Romans of old said "nimium ne crede colori." Much greater essentials for India are, a perfect frame, cheerful disposition, and good digestion.

For the rheumatic, I shall not hesitate to say that the warm climate of Asia is favourable, with common prudence; but this is absolutely necessary,

There are several of the delicious fruits of India which contain little or no acidity, such as the custard-apple and plantain, and which may consequently be eaten by those who have the most delicate digestion: I say delicious fruits of India, with all due respect to the opposite opinion of Bishop Heber. That enlightened and anniable prelate could surely not have tasted many of those which grow in the gentlemen's gardens of the southern provinces.

† See Study of Medicine, vol. v. pp. 523-524.

and I am sorry to add, is not in this instance easily submitted to: for to avoid the sometimes nearly suffocating heat of close nights, Europeans are too often tempted to sleep either altogether sub Jove, or what is worse, behind wetted tatties, and suffer accordingly: and here, as every medical officer who has heen in India can attest, are two of the most positive sources, not only of rheumatism, but of fever and palsy, amongst both his Majesty's and the Company's troops.

It is, we should imagine, scarcely necessary to observe, how baneful the climate of our Asiatic dominions is, to those men who have any tendency to mental derangement; perhaps no exciting cause for complaints of this nature has oftener been adduced than that of inordinate heat;* it is particularly noticed by Pinel in his admirable Treatise on Insanity. Cox, an English writer on the same disease, and Dr. Arnott, have fully testified the correctness of the distinguished Frenchman's assumption; and I am concerned to say, that I have myself witnessed but too many deplorable instances of madness amongst the troops of the Coromandel coast, to have any doubts on this point.

But perhaps, of all diseases, that to which the climate of India proves most ungenial is scrophula; no man with an hereditary right to that affliction should on any account be sent to India, where I have never known one individual with the malady in his habit who enjoyed tolerable health for ten months together. Soldiers so tainted are fit for nothing but lumbering up an hospital; and for the most part, after lingering a few years, burdens to themselves, and to the regiments to which they belong, fall a prey to the most frightful and ravaging ulcers. How this baneful effect of a hot climate, upon persons so unfortunately predisposed, is best to be accounted for, it may be difficult to say; the long state of darkness in which we have wandered regarding the proximate cause of affections of this nature, leaves us little more than a conjecture; I have myself almost a conviction, that one of the great sources of the evil is a deficiency of iron+ in the blood; a notion best supported by the fact of the advantage that is invariably derived from the use of the preparations of that metal in strumous disorders. This is, however, altogether unconnected with the effect of climate in such ailments; regarding which, we may so far presume, that as laxity of the solids, and a general deficiency of bodily vigour, are known to be the constant concomitants of the complaint, such a condition will be greatly increased in those territories where the extreme heat is found to enervate in no common degree.

As to the benefit or bad consequences to be looked for from a residence in India for such young men as have a predisposition to consumption, an opinion cannot be given with too much caution; and it must be owned that, as far as enlisting recruits for our foreign dominions goes, it were certainly wisest to take no person whatever of doubtful stamina: one thing is certain, that although the malady in question is to be met with in Hindoostan, it is, by no means so frequent there as in Europe. We all have seen the good often done by a speedy removal to a milder air when this hydra first threatens; indeed a changet of place, of whatever nature, would seem then to have a happy effect.

· Exerting its direct influence on the bram, in the organic defect of which lies the seat of the disease; for I cannot for a moment suppose (however hitherto it may have been beyond our power to discover, in every instance, the exact morbid condition) that any other cause than a corporeal one can exist for an aberration of intellect (see Halliday's excellent work on Insanity, just published).

† See Russel on Scrophula.-It would appear, by some experiments lately made by Englehart of Gottingen, that the red colour of the erwor of the blood is owing to the iron it contains, having deprived a portion of the cruor of its iron it became colourless.

‡ I have known several persons with the seeds of consumption in their frame, who, by a frequent effect. In preventing the suppuration of tubercles, therefore, the warm clima of Asia, we should say, might be safely recommended; for such, for instance as have simply a disposition to phthisis, but on whom the enemy has as vet made no direct attack; and more especially it might be deemed eligible for those ranks who were not under the necessity of exposing themselves to all the hardships which, as we have above noticed, the lower orders must encounter in the torrid zone. On the other hand, when the disorder has once made a fatal breach in the lungs, alas! the weakness and decay are infinitely hastened by the enervating influence of excessive heat, and death soon ends the scene. Where the greatest risk lies, then, I shall not take it upon me to decide; with such facts in their possession, parents may. It is a lamentable truth, that there is but too often merely a choice of evils in this lower world. in which we are evidently destined in many instances to be purified by suffering: on such occasions, we can but act according to the best of our judgment and moral feeling, and wait with patience the result. Of this we may be sure. that should we merit his mercy, the great Disposer of events will settle all in the manner most essentially conducive to our ultimate happiness.

To conclude, I must beg that it may not for a moment be imagined, from the observations I have here advanced, than any the slightest implication was intended to bear reference to those liberal and able men who direct the affairs of our Asiatic possessions. The prosperity of that great branch of our forcign empire well proves the justice and humanity with which it is governed. The continually fortunate termination of our eastern wars, and all our other difficulties in that quarter, at a period too when Europe trembled under the scourge of the modern Attila, and down to these later times, sufficiently testifies the talent which controlled. Nor can the smallest blame attach to the authority which now presides over the medical department immediately connected with the passing of recruits for India: zeal and assiduity are there as conspicuous, as private character is benevolent and estimable. In the mother country the evil consequences were not seen, and could only be remedied by representations from the distant territory in which they were felt; representations which, if we may judge from the result, must have been as strongly urged as they were speedily attended to.

The remarks offered in these pages, I could wish to be regarded as altogether of a general nature; most of them first occurred to me while I was on the coast of Coromandel, upwards of thirty years ago, when in medical charge of a large military station, which afforded me many opportunities of ascertaining the certain effects of a hot climate on the health of soldiers.

I have lately been much gratified to learn, that many, nay all of those inadvertencies which I have touched on are now happily corrected; so that this communication might by some be considered as superfluous; a friend, however, in whose opinion I have much faith, seems disposed to think that in a medical point of view, and altogether independent of its politico-economical nature, it might be a useful manual for such fathers as had sons for whom they looked towards Hindoostan as a land of destination. I have, therefore, in this hope, ventured to lay it before the public; closing all I have to say by expressing a sincere wish, that India may long shine the brightest jewel in the diadem of our beloved monarch; ever prosper as England's best school for all that is noble, liberal, and virtuous.

change of climate, effectually succeeded in averting the calamity altogether; one of these, and he is the only one of his family whom the disease has spared, went and returned three different times to India; always making the change when he found the enemy threatened an attack.

TURKEY AND GREECE.

Notwithstanding the multitude of works which within the last few years have appeared on the present state of Turkey and Greece, and on the relations subsisting between them, no subject is less understood in England. Assuredly modern tourists are not the authorities which we should be content with: we look for something more than descriptions, however animated, of natural scenery and costumes; relations, however lively, of personal adventures, or of anecdotes every where current and perhaps without foundation; or comparisons, however ingenious, between the present and ancient state of the two countries. Nor do we think that much more is to be learned from the ambassadors themselves, who from a conference four or five times a year with the Turkish ministers, and an intimacy with none but the interpreters or European residents, could not be expected to know much of a power which veils its designs in the darkest obscurity, and is above all careful to conceal them from foreigners. What we have long wanted has been an accurate statement of the policy exercised by the conquerors towards the conquered; of the feelings, prejudices, and habits of both parties; of the secret steps which the one has taken to preserve, the other to subvert, a protracted tyranny; and in a still higher degree, we have wished for a careful development of the causes which led to the present contest between the followers of the cross and of the crescent. Such varied information could not be hoped from any foreigner, however long his residence in Turkey, or important the functions he was required to discharge: it could be obtained from one only who, to an accurate knowledge of Turkish and modern Greek, united a knowledge no less accurate of the two nations; who derived his acquaintance with affairs, not merely from his intimacy with certain leading individuals, but from official intercourse with them; who, in short, acted a prominent part in the scenes which he described.

Well might we have despaired of meeting with these important requisites in any individual; but we rejoice to find that they are at length found in a native of Greece, Jacoraky Rizo, who has just published, in the French language, a sketch of modern Greek history from the fall of Constantinople to that of the Missolonghi. As secretary at the Ottoman Porte, as Grand Postelnik, or chief minister, to the two hospodars of Wallachia and Moldavia, and as united by blood or friendship with the noblest and most influential of the Greeks. he has acquired information to which scarcely any other person, whether Turk or Greek, could have gained access; and from patriotic motives he has made public that information. After the unfortunate issue of the insurrection under his friend and relation Ypsilanty, - an insurrection in which he was personally concerned—he fled from the Turkish dominions, and remained some time at Geneva, watching with intense anxiety the progress of events in his native country, and the effects produced by Christian sympathy throughout Europe in its behalf. There he published a view of modern Greek literature, a work which has been eagerly received on the Continent; and there also he composed his Précis de l'Histoire Moderne de la Grèce. This is by far the most interesting treatise that has ever appeared on this subject; it is indeed the only satisfactory one. Called to accompany his friend Count Capo d'Istria to the classic shores of the peniusula, he had not time to superintend its publication; and the duty devolved upon two editors, who, perhaps, have not discharged it exactly as he himself would have done. We allude more especially cially to some anecdotes which they have ventured to suppress, but which ought, by all means, to have been retained.

From this important work of Rizo's, and from some other sources hitherto unknown to English readers, we proceed to explain the general policy of the Potte towards its Christian subjects, and the causes that led to the terrible conflict which during the last few years has raged amidst "the classic haunts" of Greece.

After Mahomet the Second had taken Constantinople, his policy induced him to protect, instead of extirpating, his new subjects. He had indeed little to fear from the unwarlike inhabitants of the capital; but he well knew that their co-religionists in the mountainous parts of Greece could not easily be subdued by force of arms; and he was willing to try what effect a certain degree of elemency would produce upon the latter. Besides, he continually apprehended a crusade of the Christian powers of Europe, and he laboured with equal zeal and success to alienate the disciples of the eastern from those of the western church. He also knew that where religious differences are the least striking, the greatest degree of animosity usually prevails; that his Greek subjects, oppressed as they were, night be taught to regard even Mussulmans with less abhorrence than the schismatic Latins. Hence he resolved to preserve the national church, and to make it in some measure dependent on him, not merely for its existence, but for its very constitution.

With the concurrence of some members of the higher clergy, he elevated to the dignity of Patriki-Roum, or Patriarch of the Romans, Gennadius Scholarius, whose fanatic antipathy against the Latius he well knew. Having called the latter into his presence, he caused him to be invested, through the vizier, with the caftan, or mantle of honour, delivered with his own hands the pastoral staff; the symbol of the new dignity; presented him with a thousand ducats, and caused him to be conducted on horseback to the patriarchal residence, accompanied by his suite, and escorted by several officers of the Porte, and a regiment of Janizaries. The same ceremony has always taken place since that period on the installation of a new patriarch.

Agreeably to the order of Mahomet, the synod, at whose head is the patriarch, was composed of ten archbishops chosen by the said punnate, besides those of Heraclea, Cyzicus, Chaleedon, and Derkos, who having their thrones near Constantinople, are expressly bound to reside with the head of their religion. The latter may sometimes increase the number of members, but he cannot reduce them to fewer than ten. He cannot alone decode on any general affair, whether civil or ecclesiastical, nor can he even nominate to any vacant see, without the consent of the synod. He himself may be deposed at the instance of that synod, and of the secular clergy. When dissatisfied with their patriarch, they meet together, draw up a memorial, in which they expose their complaints, and to which they fix their seals: they present it to the Porte, and demand the deposition of their superior. The Sultan immediately complies: he enjoins the synod to choose a new head, whose election he confirms by a document written with his own hand: the following day the new patriarch is installed by the ceremony of the confluor. The Porte never deposes him unless it be on the accusation, whether true or false, of high treason.—Hist. Mod.

In private matters the patriarch may present petitions in his own name to the Porte; but when the higher dignities of the church are to be filled up, he must, in conjunction with the synod, petition the government for the berats, or mandates, necessary to confirm the appointment. The patriarch and the archbishops are compelled to pay annually into the imperial treasury 25,000 Turkish piastres. This is styled a present, though as obligatory as the benevolence nevolence of our own ancestors. He has a certain jurisdiction in civil affairs: he takes cognizance not only of wills, legacies, marriages, divorces, &c., but even of small thefts, and other minor offences committed by the members of his church. He holds his court in his own house, and his decisions are considered valid even when a Turk and a Greek are the litigating parties. He cannot, of his own authority, sentence to banishment: in that case he memorializes the Porte, and the obnoxious individual is conducted by the military to the place of exile; nor can the latter be recalled without his consent. He has a prison, to which he can consign any Greek, lay or clerical, who has committed a crime; or he can remove the delinquent to the gallies, without the intervention of the government; nor can the latter annul his sentence. Since the destruction of the Janizaries, a body of whom formerly attended him, he has a number of regular troops at his disposal, who implicitly obey his commands. These are his ministers of justice, who in some respects possess privileges not granted to their comrades under the immediate authority of the Porte.

Such are the privileges which the patriarchs have possessed, and which at first sight appear far from inconsiderable; but they are rendered comparatively nugatory, we are told, by the vexations to which the primate is subjected. He may at any moment be deposed on pretence of high treason; nor will pretexts for the charge be wanting, in a country where the grand vizier receives from every new patriarch 100,000 piastres. And it is said that many of his privileges are taken from him, and not returned without a considerable fine.

But, whatever may have been the real power of the Greek patriarch and his synod, it is certain that the Greeks were long satisfied with the apparent authority he possessed. They regarded his spiritual throne as "the ark of their safety." They saw their worship not only tolerated, but protected both in Europe and Asia; and their numerous monasteries regarded with something his reverence by the superstitious Mussulmans:

They (the Turks) repeat the names of the saints to whom religious houses are dedicated, and consider them as the sacred retreats of men detached from the world, and occupied in the worship of God. In this respect they imitate the Saracens. Moolla Hunkiar, one of the greatest of the Islamite saints, was the intimate friend of a Christian monk: on his demise, he ordered the tomb of the latter to be placed by his side in a tekke, or religious house of the Mahometans, which is the most famous in Iconium. Both tombs still exist in the same house, the sheak, or abbot, of which girds the sultans with the sword on their accession to the throne.—tbut.

The Mahometans have also their monks, the dervishes, who are divided into several classes. Thus "the Moolevis are materialists in their creed; the Bektashis honour Christ and the twelve apostles; the Zerrins reverence the Virgin." And though the Mahometan religion entertains little respect for women; though it does not allow them even in Paradisc the smallest stream of honey, while to the men it insures whole rivers of delight; though it prohibits them from entering into the religious orders, yet its professors pay great respect to Christian nums:

In 1818 (says Rizo), when I was in the service of the Ottoman ministry, I was directed to translate into Turkish two memorials, the one addressed to the reigning Sultan, the other to his favourite minister Halet Effendi, both from the nuns of a convent situated in the territories of Genoa. In both they represented the spoliation of their power by the French republicans, and besought his most religious highness (sa Hautesse très-pieuse) to send them as a present three Turkey carpets, the first green, the second blue, the third rose-colour, to cover the pavement of their temple. In return, Anatre John N. Vol. 25, No. 150. 5 E they promised to pray God for the prosperity, the glory, and the health of the Grand Seignior. The request was promptly granted.

The Greeks of the more mountainous districts had also many temporal privileges which they wrested from the fear or the policy of their rulers. The greatest of them was the nomination of captains (armatoles, or men at arms) from members of their own body, to defend their respective districts against any hostile force, as well as to maintain internal order. The influence which this body has exercised, and still exercises, on Greece, is great; we give the account of its origin in the words of Rizo:

The first sultans who undertook the conquest of Acarnania, Epirus, and Albania. were constrained, in order to secure the possession of those provinces, to grant them several privileges. Their inaccessible mountains, the warlike spirit of the inhabitants. the extent of their maritime coasts, their proximity to the Venetian territories, from which supplies of every description could easily be drawn, rendered these countries formidable to the Ottoman government. Mount Agrapha, the natural bulwark of Epirus, was the first country that obtained by treaty the privilege of having a captain and a sufficient number of soldiers for the maintenance of good order, and the defence of the towns and villages which lie around the sides and base of that almost perpendicular hill. From the time of Amurath the Second the inhabitants obtained the right of two votes out of three in the administration of their civil affairs. The Cadi, or Mussulman judge, had the first, their archbishop the second, and their captain the third; and this regulation subsisted unto the time of Ali Pacha. The example of Mount Agrapha was subsequently followed by all the provinces of continental Greece, from Albania to Macedonia, by the Peloponnesus and Eubrea. The first captain of Mount Olympus, acknowledged and authorized as such by the Turkish government towards the close of the fifteenth century, was Cara-Michali. These heads of the Greek militia were called armatoles by the Turks, and captains by their countrymen, Their soldiers were named pallicares, or courageous, and their aide-de-camp protopallicare, or the first of the courageous. Each of these captains was furnished with a diploma, in virtue of which he exercised his two-fold duties. There were also military chiefs, who were not acknowledged by the government, who continued to subsist in a state of revolt, and who were considered as leaders of handitti. But all, whether officially acknowledged or not, were bound together by the tie of common defence and common interest. Many of them, through their bravery, acquired so much power that, though persecuted and depressed by the pachas, they continued by force the exercise of their functions. Such, among others, was Androutzo, the father of Odysseus, who at the head of two hundred pallicares, sword in hand, traversed the whole Peloponnesus from Maina to Vostitza, and who was often compelled to maintain three bloody battles daily with the numerous bands of Turkish soldiers opposed to his march.

After the conquest of Epirus and Albania, the Ottoman government, according to its usual custom, left a number of regular troops to guard the new possessions ; to these troops were distributed lands held by military tenure. They occupied a portion of the coasts, the principal towns, and the open country. Ere long they mixed with the conquered inhabitants, whose manners, customs, and even language, they adopted, so that at length they became a sort of creoles, between Christianity and Mahometanism; or if they professed the latter it was only as a means of obtaining higher promotion. But a numerous and warlike population inhabited the fastnesses of these mountainous provinces. The Turkish government did not interfere with them; indeed the first successors of Mahomet had too much to do in appeasing domestic troubles to think of subduing them. Bajazet was occupied with the rival claims of his brother Zidzim. Selim I., at the commencement of his reign, had to struggle with Lrothers also, who aspired to the supreme power; and when freed from that struggle, he marched against the Persians and Mimelikes. His son Soliman warred with Hungary, Austria, Venice, and the knights of St. John, from whom he wiested the isle of Rhodes. During this period, and while Thrace, Bulgaria, and Scivia were laid write by the (bustud) Christian or the Turkish armies, Albania, Epirus, and Acarnania, being far from the scene of war, enjoyed tranquillity, and increased rapidly in strength. Of all the Mussulmans who possessed military fiefs, the first who shewed a spirit for insubordination, a consequence resulting from the feudal system, were the feudatory lords of Epirus and Albania. From their original establishment in those countries they took deep root in them, so that the Ottoman government was constrained to act towards them with caution, and foreign pichas were soldom nominated to govern them. Hence there existed between these Mahometan lords and the Porte a degree of mutual distrust, and even animosity, which was of great service to the Greek inhabitants: their installation of captains became more and more secure; the mountaineers were seldom molested in their retreats; and the commercial industry of the Christian inhabitants of the towns grew more and more successful.

From the origin of their conquests in Thessaly, the Turks established in the vast plains watered by the Penens a Mahometan colony from Iconium and other provinces of Asia Minor: this colony still bears the name of Coniari. The new settlers, entirely devoted to the principal pursuits of agriculture, soon incurred the contempt of their wallike neighbours, who robbed them with impunity. The Porte then judged it necessary to confide the guarding of the defiles to the neighbouring pachas. But as the latter could not reduce the numerous bands of Mahometan and Christian robbers, who made frequent incursions into the plains, they availed themselves of the vigilant courage of the anatoless, or Greek captains, each of whom headed a certain number of armed men, and was supported by the district which he defended.

Thus this Greek militia continued to be favoured by the government, which was so far from taking umbrage at it, that the hospodars of Wallachia and Moldavia were authorized to form their body guard, and that of the principalities, from the same iostitution: the members were known by the generic name of Albanians. It was this Christian guard which escorted them from Constantinople to Bucharest or Jassy these were the soldiers who, on the sudden appearance of Ypsilanty in Moldavia, first raised the standard of insurrection; these were the soldiers who, when the reigning sultan declared Ali Pacha a rebel, received from the Porte the concession of many new privileges; who were considered important enough to be courted by both contending parties.

But the mountainous districts of Greece were not the only parts where the native inhabitants rose to consideration and power: in the very capital of the empire they began to fill some high posts. Of these, the most important is that of grand interpreter to the Porte, a dignity to which Panajotaky was the first Greek ever raised. This was in the earlier portion of the seventeenth century, a period ever memorable to his countrymen; for since that time the office has been restricted to Greeks alone. Panajotaky owed his elevation chiefly to his varied talents, and in no inconsiderable degree to the favour of the then vizier, Kiuprooly Mehmed. So great was the consideration in which he was held, that he one day ventured to dispute with a Mahometan doctor on the truth of the Christian religion, and that too not in private, but before the vizier himself, and many ulemas. He was succeeded in this high dignity by Alexander Mavrocordato, who was one of the chief negociators at Carlowitz.* On that occasion, the latter rendered such service to the Porte that he was rewarded with the title of Confident of the Secrets of the Empire, a title which, until the breaking out of the present insurrection, was preserved in the diploma of every interpreter.

* This Mavrocordato had studied as physician in the universities of Padua and Bologna, where he became acquainted with a doctrine then recently broached,—the circulation of the blood. The Turks were not a little puzzled to conceive how simple pulsations rould prove the existence of diseases not apparent to the eye, and they accused our doctor of soricey. To prevent serious consequences, Mavrocordato published a treatise on the subject, both in Greek and Turkish, a step which served not only to his complete vindication, but to his future promotion

This dignity was solemnly prohibited to Jews and Armenians by successive edicts of the sultans. The secretary-interpreter was regarded by the government as a member of the ministry, and he was attached to the office of reis-effendi, or minister of foreign affairs. His most important privileges consisted in the exemption from tribute not only of himself, but of his sons, and twenty persons in his suite; in paying no duty on the importation of articles intended for his own consumption; in being subject to no other tribunal than the supreme court of the vizier; in appearing in state like the Turkish minister on a horse richly caparisoned, and surrounded by four pages in livery; and in being allowed to ransom Georgian slaves, on the pretence that he required them for his service, but in reality to save them from apostacy, and set them free. Formerly these slaves were allowed only to Mahometans, but the privilege in question was demanded and obtained by Panajotaky.

The Greeks were also appointed by the Porte to the offices of consuls, vice-consuls, chargés-d'affaires, and secretaries, or rather interpreters, to the few Turkish embassies despatched to the other European courts. These were offices for which the Turks were little adapted, and to which indeed they were strongly indisposed. They considered their mission as no better than a temporary banishment; and during the short period of their absence they sighed for their return. Hence it is no wonder that they effected so little good, and that they returned as ignorant as they went.*

But the most elevated, though not perhaps the most influential, of the dignities to which the Greeks alone were appointed, are the governments of Wallachia and Moldavia. The post is not hereditary, nor conferred for any definite term: he who holds it may at any time be displaced to make room for a successor; and as every new hospodar is compelled to pay a certain sum by way of gratuity to the vizier, we need not be surprised that frequent changes take place in the persons appointed over those provinces. The dragoman, or grand-interpreter, is usually the man on whom that appointment fulls; and for that reason he was considered the hospodar presumptive; but sometimes the deposed hospodar was re-called to his former dignity.

Some of the islands in the Grecian archipelago, such as the Cyclades and the Sporades, had also peculiar privileges, which they enjoyed from their subjection, or rather capitulation, to the Porte. Their inhabitants, the best sailors in those seas, the most hardy and enterprizing, were greatly wanted to oppose the maritime ascendancy of the Venetians; and they accordingly insisted on terms exceedingly advantageous. Thus they admitted no Mussulman governor nor judge; no Mahometan whatever was permitted to land; they were governed by their ancient laws; were permitted to have bells, to build churches and monasteries, to appoint their rulers, both civil and ecclesiastical. They were, however, compelled to pay a certain sum annually to the Capudan Pacha, or grand admiral of the empire, on whom, as their feudal lord, they more immediately depended. Several districts also of Coutinental Greece were considered as the peculiar property of the female branches of the reigning family, or of the great dignitaries of the empire: hence, as they were under the special protection of some powerful head, they had privileges denied to others. The same may be said of the districts whose revenues were appropriated to certain great mosques, or to the cities of Mecca and Medina: they were under the superintendence of the chief of the black cunuchs, whose duty it was to secure them in the enjoyment of their rights.

• In 1796 Jussuf Aglia Effendi was ambassador to our court. "On his return to Constantinople he was asked what remarkable thing he had seen in England. "The famous House of Commons," replied he, with the most sovereign contempt, 'Is only an assembly of insolent fellows, and evertasting praters: never did I see any thing so low. But I have seen in London something really striking,—quite worthy of admiration." The realer will be at some loss to guess what had so powerfully excited this admiration; and he will not be a little surprised to hear that it was the dexterity with which a juggler played with four oranges and two forks."

But if particular privileges were granted to certain Greeks, and even to certain islands and districts, the great body of the people were unquestionably subject to many vexations, to many galling humiliations, to many arbitrary impositions and tyrannical acts on the part of the local governors. Hence, when the victories of Russia showed the weakness of the Porte, they began to look forward to their possible, if not their speedy deliverance from the yoke of the infidel. That weakness was owing in no small degree to the personal character of the sultans, who, jealously excluded during their minority from the public administration,—no longer permitted to command armies, or govern provinces, but shut out from all intercourse with society until their elevation, than the lowest dervishes in their dominions. All discipline, too, was disregarded by the troops; and Mustapha III. found that his 700,000 soldiers, and his own pompous appellation of Shah-un-Shah, or king of kings, were but a poor defence against the thunder of the Russian legions.

Catherine was the first who effectually humbled the pride of the Turks, Her successes, her declared partiality for the Greeks, her manifestoes, and especially the appearance of her fleet in the Egean Sea in 1770, produced a powerful sensation throughout the peninsula. Several districts openly revolted, and raised the standard of liberty; but the irruntion of the Albanians, and the peace which the Sultan Abdul Hamid purchased from the empress, annihilated for a time the hopes of the Greeks, and left them exposed to the vengeance of the Porte. An expedition against them was undertaken into the peninsula; but though numbers were massacred, less mischief was done than had been feared. The Turkish general was induced to wreak his vengeance chiefly on the Albanian robbers; and the old prince Ypsilanty at Constantinople was successful enough with the vizier to intercede for a mitigation of punishment with respect to the nation in general. This was not so difficult to be obtained, as the Sultan found too much severity would induce the Greeks to migrate into Russia, and he had also, it is said, a private motive for elemency.

In the massacres of the Peloponnesus, among the slaves chosen for the seraglio was the daughter of a Greek secular priest: her beauty so charmed the Sultan that he became deeply in love with her, and promoted her to the rank of cadin, or wife. The priest, unhappy at his bereavement, went to Constantinople to claim her deliverance. He addressed himself to Demetrins Skanary, a native of Scio, and banker of the Sultana Asma, the sister of Abdul Hamid, and begged his interference. "My good father," replied Skanary, "if you value your head, take these two thousand piastres, and instantly leave Constantinople." The old man followed the advice, and his daughter remained in the Sultan's power. Doubtless she used her influence to dispose her consort to mildness towards the Greeks of the Peleponnesus, since their revolt did not draw forth the whole force of his anger.—Riza.

After the treaty at Cainardza in Bulgaria, the Russians were for some time all powerful at the Porte: yet the cession of the Crimea weighed heavily on the mind of the Sultan, and he was at length compelled to renew the war. That war, however, according to Rizo, was not owing either to Russia or England: he smiles at the ingenious motives which historians have assigned as the cause, and declares that it was owing to nothing more than a common intrigue intrigue on the part of the vizier. That personage entertained a mortal hatred against the favourites of the Sultan. He had often endeavoured to remove them from the capital by nominating them to pachalics with three tails; but they always contrived, under favour of his highness, to remain in the ministry, and to thwart the designs of their enemy. Knowing that if his authority was not supreme in the capital, it would be at the head of an army, Yussuf Pacha wished for a war with Russia, that he might command the attendance of his two rivals, and hit on some excuse for beheading them in the camp. Hence he laboured with all his might to bring about a rupture, and prevailed on the Grand Admiral Hassau Pacha to join his party: the ulemas and the Janizaries were brought over, and the timid Sultan was at length frightened into a war. Wishing, however, to save the two favourites, especially his son-in-law Nasify, he stooped to intercede for both, and even sent his daughter to sue for the life of her husband!

Not only had the Porte to contend with Russia, but Anstria also declared war. No wonder that the campaign of 1786 and the following years was so fatal to the former. The Turkish soldiers had boasted that they would march to St. Petersburgh, and bring Catherine to bend before their Sultan; but when the dreadful collision took place, they changed their tune: they represented their enemies as giants, invulnerable, and thunder-bearers.* The Janizaries were so reduced, that a tenth part only, and these unarmed, and covered with rags, returned to Constantinople, heartily cursing both Catherine and Abdul Hamid. The ministers of the Sultan durst not acquaint him with the full extent of the national losses: when the fortress of Oczakow was taken by assault they told him that the enemy had only taken Little, not Great Oczakow.

Abdul Hamid believed the gross lie; but one day as he was passing incognito along the street, he met a soldier from that important fortress who was so maimed as to be obliged to crawl on all fours, begging for bread. The latter knew the emperor, and in his despair he seized the bridle, and cried out: "Most mighty Sultan, I have been wounded at the storning of Oczakow, while fighting for religion and for thee; and now no man pities me; I am dying of hunger."—"So thou wast wounded at the taking of Little Oczakow?" demanded the Sultan. "What says thy Highness? there is no Great and Little Oczakow; there is only one of that name, and it is in the possession of the misbelieving Russians." The Sultan was so enraged at being made the dupe of his ministers, that he immediately exiled some, and beheaded the rest.

During this contest, some of the Greek captains made frequent incursions into the plains of the Pelopounesus, and harassed the Ottoman troops by their desultory and irregular mode of warfare. When Selim III. succeeded Abdul Hamid in 1789, he found that he had serious difficulties to contend with; a partial insurrection in Greece, and two haughty powers breathing his destruction: besides the Egean Sea, all the maritime coasts of his empire were infested by pirates. That monarch had a mind strong by nature, but utterly unfit for presiding at the helm of affairs. Called from the slumbers of the seraglio† to conduct the vessel of the state through the stormy sea into which • In the time of Catherine the very name of Russian was sufficient to frighten the Turks. We are told that when a quarrel once broke out between two regiments of Janizures, which lasted three whole days, and could not be appeased either by the Aga or the vider, the Sultan order that a Russian cop should be thrown between the contending parties. Both immediately retired, in equal alarm and dismay. Well might Ismael Bey, the Turkish minister, say that for a century the Ottoman power resembled a snuff-box ornamented with rich brilluants, which contained only fifth—that Russia had taken off the lid-

† From Othman to Soliman the sons and grandsons of the sultans lived free, commanded armies, and governed provinces; but their frequent revolts induced the Porte to adopt a strange expedient. It was resolved that the successor to the throne should be, not the eldest of the Sultan's sons, but of his which it had been driven, he learned for the first time that he had enemies to oppose: yet he resolved not to shrink from the contest; he often asserted that he would take full vengeance on all, that the crescent should ride triumphant over the cross. His measures for prosecuting the war were vigorous, and his preparations on a magnificent scale; yet defeat succeeded defeat. Belgrade, and all Servia, yielded to the Austrians; Ismailow fell to the Russians. The Ottoman pride then gave way; peace was sued for, and ratified by the contending parties in 1792. To Russia great sacrifices were made: but as Austria was about to war with France, she was satisfied with fewer concessions. The domineering tone of the former country now became louder than ever: her consuls and vice-consuls were scattered over the Levant; and her flag was held in so much respect, that it served as a protection to every vessel which unfurled it, whatever the nation to which the vessel belonged.

The excess committed by the Janizaries, who were dreaded only at home. and who were considered as the authors of the late disasters, rendered the Turkish ministers anxious to supplant them by the establishment of regular troops. Accident favoured their views. Mustapha III., the predecessor of Abdul Hamid, had perceived that regular troops only could make head against European armies, and he would have adopted a more improved discipline had not death prevented him. Selim, while in his hermitage, could know nothing of what his father designed; but after his accession, having one day entered into the imperial treasury, he discovered three volumes of Vauban, and on them a slip of paper with these words, evidently intended as a memorandum, in the hand-writing of Mustapha: "Let these books be translated, and the system they teach be put into practice." (The first volume related to the siege of fortresses, the second to their defence, and the third to military tactics in general.) Selim, on leaving the apartment, met his physician, and inquired whether the latter knew any Greek capable of translating the volumes. The physician immediately named his friend Prince Constantine Ypsilanty, who was accordingly engaged to enter on the task. He was assisted by his cousin, the hospodar Carazza. In a year the book was translated: it was soon printed; copies of it were sent to all the commanders of fortresses in the empire; and regular troops ordered every where to be formed. In this great undertaking the Porte was much encouraged by Austria, through the Ottoman ambassador, who, in 1793, resided at Vienna, and who transmitted to his government all the information likely to prove useful in its accomplishment,

While this important innovation was carrying into effect, the Grand Admiral, Hussein Pacha, was attempting the reformation of the Turkish marine. He manned his vessels with the most experienced Greek sailors, especially from Hydra, Spezzia, and Ipsara. To these islands he granted new and valuable privileges; permitted them to trade to any part of the Mediterranean, unshackled by Turkish vexations; and conferred extraordinary rewards on every sailor who distinguished himself either by courage or dexterity.

But it could not be expected that the Janizaries would tamely see themselves supplanted nephews, the son never succeeding except in default of the collateral heir. Hence, on the death of the emperor, the sons are all imprisoned, and the nephew has them all at his mercy. They never appear in public after their early infancy.

In the out-recesses of the seragilo is a vast garden surrounded by walls as high as Turkish jealousy can In the out-recesses of the seragilo is a vast garden surrounded by walls as high as Turkish jealousy, and raise them. In the centre is a palace, the residence of illustrious slaves, and another equally isolated, which is the abode of the heirs to the throne. Each of the latter has a separate apartment; he sees no one but a few slaves attached to his service. If the presumptive her have children during his confinement, they a few slaves attached to his service. If the presumptive her have children during his confinement, they are strangled at their birth. Each Shah Zudoh, or sons of the Shah, has his agent at the Porte to transversarially and the strangled of the presumptive forms and its called Aga Buba, or old lord. He is not allowed to see the heirs, nor to correspond with any without the inspection of the chief of the black enumely.

supplanted by the new troops: they raised a cry of execration, not in Constantinople only, but in Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, and indeed throughout the empire, against the new order of things. The pachas of the respective provinces, seeing the increasing disaffection, took care to espouse the cause of the Janizaries, who were also favoured by the ulemas, in the hope that they should ultimately be enabled to wrest their independence from the Sultan. The imperial cabinet was divided into two powerful parties; each pursued the other with implacable fury, and sought by seditious writings to extend their feelings to the empire at large. Supplies from the provinces came so tardily into the treasury at Constantinople, that the state appeared on the verge of ruin: the minister, Zeleby Effendi, was heard to declare that its whole revenues were insufficient to maintain 40,000 regular troops. Bulgaria, Mycia, Thrace, and a portion of Macedonia, were overrun by numerous bands of Mahometan robbers, who, finding no efficient force to oppose them, ravaged the country, ransacked the towns, and massacred the inhabitants. These excesses were winked at, not only by the ayans or primates of the provinces. but by some of the ministers themselves, who were anxions to seize on every pretext for discrediting the unpopular changes effected by the Sultan.

In this horrible state of things, a Greek, seeing the progressive prosperity of his country's fleets, and stimulated perhaps by the heart-stirring events to which revolutionary France gave rise, formed a design for striking a bold blow for the liberty of Greece. This was Riga, a native of Thessaly, whose nearest relations had been victims to Turkish ferocity: hence he breathed nothing but revenge. In 1796 he quitted the service of Prince Michael Soutzo, then hospodar of Wallachia, and proceeded to Vicnoa, to concert with a few patriots as determined as himself, the means most likely to attain the end in view. Unacquainted with the dispositions and resources of the people whom they were labouring to free, and apparently ignorant of the fact that great revolutions must be effected, not by a few eager partizans, but by the simultaneous will of the nation,—that the slow, unysterious progress of circumstances is the indispensable actor in such dramas, they listened only to their own enthusiasm, and consequently drew down ruin on their own heads, and almost on the cause they had sworn to esponse.

Riga, led away by a heated imagination, gave occasion both by his actions and words to the suspicions of the Austrian police, which arrested him in 1798 at Trieste, at the moment of his embarkation for the peninsula. Having seized his person, the Austrian government acquainted the Turkish ambassador at Vienna with the circumstance; that minister immediately communicated it to the Porte, which learned the whole at the same time from a detailed note of the Austrian internuncio. Riga, seeing a stop thus suddenly placed to his designs, and feeling averse to implicate the remaining conspirators, stahbed himself with a poignard; but the wound was not mortal, and he was imprisoned, with eight other leaders, at Semlin, a strong Austrian fortress on the Danube, near Belgrade. That Christian power awaited only the reply of the Porte to surrender the victims. They had friends at Constantinople, who made every effort to save them. These had recourse to the interference of my father-in-law, Alexander Mano, son-in-law and agent to the old prince Alexander Ypsilanty, then hospodar of Wallachia. The former (from whence my knowledge of these particulars is derived) immediately waited on the minister of the interior, Ibrahim-Nessim Effendi. He persuaded Ibrahim that the charge was an absurd calumny against the unfortunate but innocent men; that five or six poor merchants were little able to effect a revolution. The Turkish minister professed himself satisfied, and promised to save them for 150,000 francs. The sum appearing exorbitant, it was not immediately paid, and in the mean time the prisoners were put to death at Belgrade,-Ibid.

This attempt led to no results: no measures were adopted to trace out the conspiracy in its ramifications. Selim, in the interior of his palace, struck his Persian guitar, and composed songs inspired by Bacchus, in happy ignorance of all that had happened.

It was the fate of Selim to be unpopular with all parties, during some part or other of his agitated reign. His alliance with Russia and Austria against Nanoleon was popular enough; but he soon fell into general contempt: his authority was despised, though not denied, by the most powerful of his provincial governors. Restricted by no superior curb, they became monsters of cruelty and extortion, and anxious for the arrival of the day on which they could secure their future independence. Let one example suffice to shew their almost incredible cruelty. The pacha of Piddir, Hafiz Ali, having defeated some Mahometan rebels, made up their heads in sacks to be sent to the reigning Sultan. Through inadvertence, his secretary, in the letter which was to accompany the precious present, mentioned more heads than the sacks contained. We might have supposed that the mistake could easily be remedied by writing another letter: no such thing. Ali ordered his officers to run through the streets, and to bring as many heads as were deficient. He was nromptly obeyed; the heads of forty Christians, the first persons met, were soon brought in, and added to the heap.

But no pacha was ever more blood-thirsty than Ali of Tepelan, who is generally known in this country as Ali Pacha of Januina. As this extraordinary man has exercised so much influence on the affairs of Turkey and Greece, and has been the object of such fearful curiosity to all Europe, we present the reader with a brief account of him.

In his origin, Ali had little prospect of arriving at much power in Greece; but he was one who knew how to take advantage of circumstances. When, in 1773, the Porte took such signal vengeance on the Albanians, who had openly defied its authority, he rendered himself conspicuous for his loyalty, and obtained from Abdul Hamid the nomination to a pachalic with two tails. He daily laboured to extend his influence by making partizans of any sort, Turks, Christians, Albanians, or Epirotes. He was liberal in his gifts, and still more so in his promises. In 1788 he served in the army of the Vizier against Russia; and during his stay at Constantinople he saw enough of the weakness of the Sultan, and the venality of the ministry, to be assured that money would always purchase him a voice in the divan. On his return to Epirus he began to act as if he had no superior: he dispossessed the hereditary beys, seized on towns and villages, and raised large sums by contributions, unknown to the Porte—nay, he took Jannina in direct opposition to the orders of his master.

The reign of Selim III. was as favourable to Ali as had been that of Abdul Hamid; for the one was as much the dupe of his ministers as the other. Besides, circumstances singularly propitious united to extend his influence: it was his lot to be courted by two great rivals, the Sultan and Buonaparte. The former considering that he was best able, from his position and resources, to make head against the French, who had just obtained possession of the Ionian isles; and the latter, viewing him as already disaffected to the Turkish government, and likely to besitate at nothing to forward his own ambitious designs, zealously cultivated his friendship. Both, with the view of strengthening their own interests, promoted his. His excesses almost make humanity shudder. In 1798, during a sacred fast in the Greek church, he fell on the two Greek towns of Agi-Vasili and Novitza, in Albania, slew 6,000 inhabitants, transported the rest to the plains of Thessaly. Preveza was sacked, half the inhabitants massacred, and the rest sold for slaves: Butrinto and Vonitza surrendered, but did not escape the tyrant's cruelty. But he failed before Parga, which was protected by the Souliotes, the most valiant of the Greek bands : these he resolved to destroy by force or stratagem. They inhabited Mount Soulis. in Epirus, the passes of which are amazingly strong. It is about six hours' ride from the Ionian Sea, and has two towns, one on the west, the other on the south. Before assembling his army, he called together the chief Mahon metan lords of Albania and Epirus; told them that the Ottoman dominion was drawing towards its close; and that, according to ancient prophecy. to them alone was reserved the succession to the empire: but first of all Souli must be destroyed. They promised to join him with their forces in reducing that formidable race': extraordinary preparations were made; and at the head of many thousands, he assailed, but without success, the outnosts of the enemy, who amounted to no more than 1,500 men. Seeing that to reduce them was impossible, he proposed peace, which was accepted, but which was soon broken by the faithless pacha. Hostilities re-commenced with renewed vigour, but with little success on the part of Ali. He had then recourse to all the dilatoriness of a siege, and to all the arts of bribery. To the captain, Zimo-Zerva, he offered 400,000 Turkish piastres if the latter would withdraw his troops from Souli: he was assured, in return, that not a stone in the country would be exchanged for the money. In the meantime thousands upon thousands fell from the ranks of the invaders, and deeds of incredible valour were performed by the Souliotes. One of their captains, Foto-Tzavellas by name, committed a horrid carnage in the enemy's troops. He had, when a child, been left as hostage in the power of Ali, and when his father resumed hostilities against the pacha, the tyrant hoped that by means of the child the father might be induced to submit. One day Veli, the son of Ali, ordered the boy to visit his parent, representing the imminent risk to which his life was hourly exposed, and praying the other to desist from the war: the order was firmly refused. "I will burn thee alive," exclaimed the furious Veli. "I fear thee not," replied the undaunted Foto: "if thou dost, my father will serve thine, or thy brother, in the same manner." The child was saved to prove a serious check to Ali. But however heroic the defence of the Souliotes, their small numbers could not for ever hold out against the countless hordes of assailants. At the end of three years they capitulated; but Ali violated the conditions. They continued to defend themselves at every step until they obtained a place of security in Corfu.

After this partial success, Ali bent his whole attention to the destruction of the independent Greek chiefs; but he failed in every attempt. He then changed his policy: he entered into a close alliance with them, that by their assistance he might exterminate the authority of the Mussulman lords throughout the Peloponnesus. The latter both feared and hated him, and only waited for a signal from the Sultan to fall on the audacious pacha with increased strength.

(To be concluded next month.)

JOURNAL OF A ROUTE THROUGH MYSORE, THE COORG COUNTRY, CANARA, AND MALABAR:

BY THE LATE LIEUT. COL. WM. LAMBTON.

(Concluded from p. 611.)

On the 4th and 5th January 1805, marched to Kasragoodo, distant from Coomlah about nine miles. The road runs at some distance from the beach along the hard tract, and is very good in general. Crossed a river about half-way.

The fort of Kasragoodo stands on high ground nearly a mile from the heach, and about half a mile from the inlet of the sea which receives the Chanderagerry river, two miles south. This high ground is insulated by the water on the west side, and by paddy fields or very low grounds on the other sides, forming a deep ravine, but entirely exposed to the fort or its outworks.

The figure of this fort is irregular, and stands on the table of the hill. On the west or sea side is the gateway, defended by small bastions, and projecting out it forms the principal defence of that side of the work. There is a circular bastion on the right and another on the left at a considerable distance from the gate, and are connected with it by ramparts, each making a saliant curve, and may be well defended; these form the entire face towards the sea. The remainder of the work consists of three sides of unequal lengths, the longest being to the north; at the S.E. angle of the fort stands a high cavalier, on the east is a small garden and a well, communicating with the interior by a small sally-port leading under the rampart; on the outside is a narrow ditch circumscribing the whole work. The rampart is not more than nine or ten feet broad, and the parapet about eight feet high, full of loop-holes. The N.E. part of the hill on which the principal work stands, projects some distance from the ditch of the fort, and has had a line and narrow ditch to defend it, which are now in ruins. All these works are built of the hard composition formerly mentioned, and although near 300 years old, are yet in good state, and might soon be put in repair. There is abundance of good water within the fort, and the position is no where commanded by the high ground on the opposite side of the ravine.

On the 6th January, marched to Bakul, about eight miles further down the coast. We crossed the Chanderagerry river about two miles from Kasragoodo. The fort of Chanderagerry stands on its south bank on an elevated situation, forming a small peninsula, having the river on the north and N.W., and a deep hollow, with paddy fields and a tope, on the south; and another similar hollow runs on the east side, the neck of the table-land being on the S.E., along which runs the great road. The fort is nearly triangular, having the gateway on the N.E., which cuts off the angle and forms a short side sufficient for the gateway and the works that defend it. The other three sides are to the E., S., and N.W. The angle formed by the east and south sides projects towards the neck of land, which subjects it to an oblique fire from both these faces, and from the direct fire of three large circular bastions, one at the saliant angle, another about a third of the way between that angle and the gateway, and a third nearly the midway on the south face.

The three longest sides are all as well flanked as the construction of these kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, kind of works will admit of, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, which is a perfect glacis, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis, and the slope of the hill forming a perfect glacis.

cient for placing scaling ladders, and the height of the parapet from the berm being upwards of thirty feet, it therefore follows that the place is tenable against escalade, and thence the necessity of opening trenches, which can only be done on the neck of land for batteries to act with effect, and there the hardness of the ground would render it almost impracticable.

This work has four large circular bastions and four small ones; a cavalier over the gateway forming a kind of traverse; and a small lower work in front of the gateway, having a face with two small circular bastions to the north, and flanks to the east and west. The rampart within is almost ten feet broad, and the parapet seven feet high. The area is nearly level, and has an excellent well within it. This work is not large, and with a little amendment might be made very strong. It is built of the same kind of composition as the others, and by lowering the parapet, raising a banket, and opening three embrazures in each of the large bastions, it might be defended by a small body of men against a large army. The great defect of this, and all Indian works that I have seen, is the height of the rampart above the glacis; for where batteries can be erected, they can breach to the foot of the wall.

After leaving Chanderagerry the road runs along the upland, and is good the whole way to Backul.

The fort of Backul is irregular, and has the north side nearly straight, as well as the greatest part of the west face next the sea. It is a curve to the S.W., and continues so to the S.E., where it has been breached by the Eng. lish in 1782, and afterwards repaired by them all along that side, where four bastions have been completed, with the intervening ramparts, and form a reentering curve. The gateway enters on the N.E, being well protected, and covered by an advanced battery. The principal work consists of fifteen circular bastions, seven of which have been repaired during the Sultaun's time, and embrazures opened from the top of the parapet. Besides these there are three advanced batteries; one next the sea, which communicates with the body of the place by a sally-port, two to the S.E. communicating by a small sally-port under the east rampart. In the interior there are two raised batteries; one to the westward, built by the Sultaun, and another to the S.E., built by the English, and is elevated above that part of the S.E. face which has been repaired by them. Besides these, there is a high cavalier a little way to the north of the English battery, commanding the whole work. The area is filled with the ruins of houses, powder magazines, &c., and there are a great number of wells both within and without the fort, many of which are now frequented, and afford excellent water.

The west and south sides are washed by the sea, on the north the plain is nearly on a level with the beach, but the work standing upon a rock; all these three sides are considerably elevated, and particularly the S.E. part, where it was breached. The ground to the eastward forms a regular glacis, with dry ditch and bound hedge. The fort, independent of the ground it stands on, is very high, and the parapet is about ten or twelve feet above the rampart, and filled with loop-holes. The great height of the walls and rock serve to secure it against an escalade, and even against approaches, except to the eastward, where it is best fortified. The English erected their breaching battery upon a spot of rising ground, having a turn of the sea beach between them and the fort. Had the place been well defended, both their difficulties and their loss must have been very great in the assault.

During the Bednore government, when all these forts were built, Backul must have been a place of considerable importance, and when Hyder conquered quered the Canara country it was the great depôt of all the others. The inhabitants were then very numerous, and consisted of Mussulmauns, Rajapoots, Moplas, and a variety of Hindoo castes. The vestiges of a vast extent of buildings are yet visible; but of this once populous place there now remains but a small village.

On the 7th I left Backul and proceeded inland about fourteen miles to Kunduddakamully, a high mountain, and one of my principal stations for carrying the triangles down the coast. The country is open about four miles to the eastward; the remainder is through an entire jungle, very hilly and thinly inhabited, not more than three or four villages appearing the whole march, and these are all hidden away in the hollows, which are the only parts of the country that admit of cultivation. In these secreted situations the inhabitants are rather timid; but I met with every attention notwithstanding. They are an active race of people, and might be formidable enemies were they allowed to carry arms; but certainly military prowess can never have been a virtue among them, otherwise, with the natural strength of their country, they must have remained unconquered to this day.

These jungles abound with wild elephants and tigers, the latter are said to destroy many of the inhabitants, they not having the means of killing those animals.

On the 11th I returned toward the sea coast to Munjiumpuddy-betta, a march of about eight miles through a rugged and jungly country. Nothing remarkable. This is also one of my principal stations for carrying down the triangles.

On the 12th marched to Nelessaram, about nine miles distant. The road passes to the eastward of Hos-droog (which will be described hereafter), and continues through a sheet of paddy fields nearly the whole way, and at some distance from the beach. Crossed two rivers. On the following day continued our march to Cavai, over a beautiful flat the whole way, and a great part of it in cultivation. Cavai stands on an island formed by two branches of a river falling into the sea to the north and south. The distance across the island is not more than three-quarters of a mile: about half way across there are the remains of a fort of European construction. It has been intended for a square work with defences, and there is a canal communicating with the south river which has been intended to supply the ditch with water. The remains of this work are, a square tower bastion at the N.E. angle, a ruined house in the interior, and steps to the gateway on the cast. On the south bank of the south river there is another square tower, with embrazures and loop-holes, similar to that on the island.

On the 14th went to Mount Dilli, about six miles south from Cavai, the road good and partly along the beach.

Mount Dilli is a high promontory, commanding an extensive prospect, and is a remarkable sea mark. The beach forms a projecting point to the S.W., and embraces the whole mountain. At the extremity of this point is a rocky hill, separated from the range by a ravine. On this rock there stands a square fort, with two bastions towards the west, and an enclosed high tower at the N.E. angle. The rock round from the N.W. to the S.W. is steep and washed by the surf at the bottom. The upper part forms a smooth glacis to the fort on all sides, and is well defended.

From the top of Mount Dilli peak, which is a principal station in this survey, Cannanore is distinctly seen, and also the Koorg mountains. The weather was extremely hazy when I was at this station, which prevented my seeing a great distance to the southward; not even Tellicherry could be distinguished. The flag-staff at Cannanore is the last point for the present; and between that and Mangalore the triangles are well disposed to become a basis for both inland and marine surveys.

On the 16th and 17th marched back to Hos-droog. This is a large fort. standing on a rock, which is cut away on the south and east sides, with an intention to form a berm to the rampart, but it has never been reduced to a similar form with the fort. On the north side, where the ground is nearly on a level with the body of the place, a narrow ditch has been cut, from which is a gentle slope outward, making a regular glacis. The principal part of the work is nearly a square. At the S.E. angle a small square projects out to the east, being connected with the main rampart, through which is the door into this square, the east face of which has two small bastions, one at the S.E. and the other at the N.E. angle. In the centre of this square there is a high cavalier, commanding the whole interior of the fort. This small projected work forms a kind of citadel to the rest. On the north face is the gateway entering immediately into the area, and is covered by a square with two small bastions at the N.W. and N.E. angles; the door of that square entering on the west side. The work is defended by circular bastions at the corners and along the sides, amounting to fourteen, including the bastions at the gateway and fort on the S.E., and are as well arranged as the nature of a square work and circular defences would admit of. The height of the wall from the berm is upwards of eighteen feet, and that of the parapet above the rampart within between eight and nine feet. The rampart in most places is very high above the ground within, and is not more than ten feet in breadth. The bastions to the westward have two and three embrazures, but they are too confined for guns; those to the east and north have four and five. The whole of the parapet is loop-holed. About the middle of the south face there is a small sally-port, leading to the berm.

From the S.W. angle a narrow strip of land runs out, being a continuation of the same rock on which the fort is erected; and at the extremity of that strip a modern circular work has been begun, but not finished: it is about the distance of a musket-shot from the fort. That advanced work communicates with the main one by a small sally-port on the west side, close to the circular bastion at the corner.

The place may be taken by escalade on the south and west sides, and breached on the north side close on the right of the first bastion east from the gateway. The bound hedge affords cover, and the ditch at that place is scarcely excavated. The interior has contained a great number of houses, all now in ruins; the only building now remaining is an old thatched pagoda, which appears to have been built when this work was erected.

This is the last of the large forts to the southward of Mangalore, till we come to Cannanore; but there is a continuation of small ones down to Mount Dilli.

The arrangement which I have made of the triangles connecting Mangalore with Cannanore, and these with the mountains at the head of the ghauts, has been done with a view, not only to fix the latitudes and longitudes of the principal places, but to lay a foundation for a survey of the sea-coast, an object which I am persuaded will one day or other merit the most serious consideration of Government. It has been with this view also, that the secondary triangles have been carried to the northward as high as Koondapoor, from which place, down to Cannanore and Tellicherry, the shore seems to be one continued chain of fortified positions. Those to the northward of Mangalore

I have

I have not seen, but the description given of the principal ones to the southward will convey some idea of their nature and extent. It may further be noticed, that these works are intended to defend the numerous inlets and harbours with which this coast abounds, and if I mistake not, the principal harbours for small craft, on the coast of Canara alone, amount to eighteen; that is to say, harbours for vessels drawing six and eight feet water and upwards.

What use these places might be of to us at present may perhaps be a question, and certainly to occupy such a number would not only require a great force, but that force being divided into so many parts must be weakened, and those places must fall in succession; and this might probably be the case were they in possession of an enemy; but as that would cost us both time and men. it would perhaps be most advisable to destroy those works, saving some principal one to serve as a depot and rallying point, and have the coast protected by armed vessels of a construction suited to the harbours, with the addition of some inclosed redoubts at the entrance of those harbours: for if an enemy were to attempt a descent, it must be made in boats from some distance, as ships cannot anchor near the shore. This system would furnish a moving force which, under every circumstance, either of attack or defence, is the most efficient. For, whatever notion of security we may attach to fortifications, one thing is evident, that the force necessary to defend them is lost to every other purpose; and also that no force ought to be stationary, except in very limited and peculiar cases, such as protecting arsenals, which having to furnish military stores in various directions, cannot be otherwise than stationary; or in defence of particular positions for maintaining a line of communication.

If this or some other mode of defence be not adopted, whatever power has the harbour of Goa, and a superior fleet at sea, must command the whole of that coast; there is nothing to prevent a landing any where, and committing depredations, or even keeping possession of the country, should the inhabitants be friendly.

Having ascertained the positions of several points in the neighbourhood of Mangalore, and completed what I thought was necessary there, I left it on the 3d of February, and proceeded towards Moodabiddery, where I arrived on the 12th February.

Moodabiddery, or Morbiddery, as it is called by the English, is the remains of ancient grandeur when the Jyne caste, or the followers of Bhooda, were powerful in Canara, and it is now inhabited chiefly by that description of people, of whom there are many in different parts of this district: there are a great number of pagodas, all built of hewn stone, and the large one is a superb and stately edifice. The pillars that support it within are apparently turned, and elegantly carved, and the sculpture exhibits a great variety of small figures appertaining to their religion. The roof is also a display of very ingenious workmanship. The great pillar in front of the pagoda is superior to all the rest in taste.

To the eastward of the village there are a number of square pyramids which have composed a part of their religious edifices, but are now in ruins, and unconnected with the rest of the buildings. From the fragments that remain, this place appears to have been of great extent, and has been the residence of a rajah: a large thatched building on the south side of the pagoda is now called the rajah's house.

About a mile east of the large pagoda there is an old fort, of a square form, with seven circular bastions, and a fortified gateway on the west side. This work is surrounded by a ditch and a very low and narrow glacis. The fort is built built of the same rough stone or composition as the rest, and is in good repair, excepting the N.W. bastion, at the angle, which is in ruins. It is commanded by ground to the south and west, the latter of which is covered with a tope and houses.

From Moodabiddery to Jemalabad on the 16th and 17th February.

The first part of the road from Moodabiddery to Yaenoor is pretty good, but the latter part runs over many ascents and descents, and crosses two small rivers. This distance is near twelve miles. From Yaenoor to Jemalabad, a distance of fourteen miles, the road is in general very good, with the exception of a few breaks, which might be readily repaired. On approaching Jemalabad the country is covered with a thick jungle, and of course is little cultivated.

Jemalabad is a fortified rock of extraordinary strength. It is a precipice on every side except to the N.E., and even there the road has been cut out of the solid rock. The ground on that side is a steep ascent from the pettah, and the work commences about half way up. The first gateway enters on the north side of a small advanced work, which is a continuation of the line to the eastward, but terminates on the N.W. at the rock. This advanced line defends the brow of the hill where the road ascends, as well as the ridge running out a short distance to the north.

A little further up the hill the second gateway enters, and runs across from the eastern line to the rock. This defends the space between the two gateways, but the ground within that space is very uneven, and admits of a lodgment.

Within the second gateway the road commences, and consists of a flight of very steep steps, covered by a parapet of rock formed by the excavation, and broad enough for a column of four deep to move: at the top of this flight of steps is the third gateway, which, in perpendicular height from the second, appears to be nearly one-third the perpendicular height of the whole hill from the pettah. This gateway defends the flight of steps, and may be rendered impregnable, for it commands a considerable space down along the steps. The present gateway is but ill constructed, the parapet of the wall being much too high, and crosses the road too obliquely.

On the summit of the rock are batteries for commanding the pettah on one side, and the great road to the south on the other; but shot from these high works could only plunge, and do little execution.

The chief and ultimate defence depends on the gateway at the head of the steps. The only use of the upper batteries to the N.E. would be to prevent a lodgment between the first and second gateways, and to annoy an enemy below.

On the top of the rock there are three magazines; two built with arched bomb-proofs, and the other cut out of the solid stone. There is water at the summit for about six months in the year: at present it is nearly dry, and cannot be supplied till the next rains; a circumstance necessary to be known. There are now upwards of sixty guns of different calibres, mostly unmounted, some very fine twelves and eighteen-pounders lying within the two first gateways. There is also a large quantity of powder, with some shot and lead.

This droog being stored with provisions, ammunition, and water, might be defended by a very small force against an army. It is true, the first gateway might be breached if a battery could be erected on the ridge of ground to the north of it, but that battery would be subject to dreadful execution from the guns at the top of the rock, if they could be brought to bear upon it, and throw shells in place of shot. If that outwork should be carried, and a lodgment made within it, the upper battery might still do injury, if the guns could be depressed so low. Should even the second gateway be carried, the most serious operations would be yet to commence. The third gateway being well constructed, the rampart sufficiently high to check an attempt at escalade, and well defended by musketry, with one gun to be served with grape; the excavated passage of steps being filled with men, they might be destroyed without being able to make resistance, for they could not present a front equal to that which they would have to oppose, and the steps being so high from the great declivity of the passage, that the files at the head of the column only could make use of their fire: even shot rolled over the parapet would make dreadful havoc in bounding down the flight of steps.

What object this may answer at present I know not, unless, by having a small garrison there, it is prevented being possessed, and becoming the rallying point in case of defection among the inhabitants. Tippoo fortified it, and intended that place to be the seat of his government below the ghauts. It is true it commands the great road leading down the Kurdadikul pass to Moodabiddery and Mangalore, but it is in the midst of a jungle, and only calculated for the seat of a plundering polygar. Should there be a rebellion in Canara. the inhabitants would rely on the natural strength of the country, and take shelter in their recesses and concealed habitations, which a traveller in the midst of peace finds a difficulty in exploring.

The Sultaun kept a considerable military force here, and obliged a number of inhabitants to quit the country, and reside in the pettah which was built for that purpose: but the remains of that pettah are now but a few shops, forming a small bazar to supply a company of sepoys at present stationed there. It has been very large, and fortified all round. During the mutiny of the garrison in 1800, Colonel Sertorius, who commanded the troops sent to reduce the place, got possession of the pettah, and erected a battery of two guns on a rising ground on the east part of the pettah wall; but these would have been useless had the mutineers held out, and a blockade only could have afforded the means of reducing them. As a military post, in point of defence, it is certainly a strong one, and should the road down the Kurdadikul pass become a military one, this droog may be useful as commanding it.

From Jemalabad to the foot of the pass the road is very good, and the distance about nine miles N.E. There are only two villages on the way, one near the pass, and fine open ground, suited for encampments, with good water near it.

On the 18th February I ascended the ghaut, and the following are the remarks made during the time:

Twenty minutes after leaving the ground, the steep part begins :--continues pretty steep and stony: -30' a steep and stony place, very short, but rocky:-35' easy ascent:-soon level-easily repaired:-good. 40' easy ascent:-a little stony ;-short descent ;-level,-difficult ;-level and good again ; -short descent; - gentle ascent again :- continues good :- gentle descent ;- level. -A little broken.-Gentle ascent again and road very good.-One hour, another small hollow :--a little stony :--across the hollow very rocky, but easily repaired:-short ascent;-rather steep, but not difficult:-short ascents and descents :- the road good :- thick forest all the way :- road continues good. 14 hour, stony part, but short.—Ascent and a little stony.—Rocky and broken, but easily repaired .- Continues rocky and broken, but not difficult:--continues to rise gradually.-More rocky.-Thick and lofty forest. 1) hour, road 5 G good.—Rocky ascent again, but easily repaired:—rather steep and rocky.—More steep and rocky, but reparable. 1\frac{3}{4} hour, very rocky but not steep:—rocky ascent continues, but not difficult:—gradual ascent again.—Less rocky but more steep: still more so, with stone and rock, but easily repaired.—The rocks apparently of a soft nature. 2h. 10m., a very steep rocky place:—less so, but yet steep and rocky:—gentle ascent again.—Pretty steep and stony again. 2h. 50m., a very steep and rocky place, surface easily smoothed.—The mountainous precipice close on the right, made up of strata.—Rocky, but less steep.—Gentle winding ascent.—Road very good. 3h. 15m., a rocky place, reparable by blowing the rocks.—The road cut out of the side of the precipice.—Very rocky, but a gentle ascent.—Road cut out in steps for a small distance.—Narrow, and still cut out of the rock. 3ł hours, at the head of the pass.

From noting the time, and allowing about one mile and a quarter per hour, it will not be difficult to form an idea with respect to this ghaut. The most troublesome place is where the road is cut out of the rock on the side of the mountain, it there wants breadth and security. We met a great number of loaded bullocks going down. My baggage was carried by coolies with light loads, as I expected much more difficulty than I met with.

From the head of the pass down to Sultaun-pett, where I encamped, the distance is about a mile and a half, down the declivity of a mountain to the eastward. This village lies near the foot of Balaroyn-droog, on the N.E., and is on the great road to Woostara.

Balaroyn-droog is a stupendous fortified mountain, 5,000 feet in perpendicular height above the sea. The road to the top is long, and of easy ascent. It commences from the foot of the valley lying south of the village of Sultaupett, and on the north side of the droog. The first part winds to the S.W. and S. till it comes to the steep side of the mountain, when it turns to the left, and crossing a ravine, it enters the first part of the fortification, where there is a redoubt commanding the cap of the hill on which it stands, and overlooks a deep valley on the cast. From this redoubt the line begins, and continues on the left of the road in a S.E. direction for about a quarter of a mile to another gateway and redoubt. From thence the line takes an easterly course, heading the valley just mentioned, and winds round another mountain, steep and abrupt, to the eastward.

The road continues on a gentle ascent from the second gateway, and turning to the westward, to the summit of a still higher mountain than the rest, where there is a square mud fort, with three circular bastions at the east, north, and south angles. This fort completely commands every other part, but having no ditch, it may be either scaled or breached from a part of the same ridge, but lower, lying to the S.E. From the N.W. side a line commences, and is continued from thence along the brow of the lower part of the hill, forming a precipice to the north and east, and joins the fort again on the east angle. Within this area, and considerably below the fort, on the N.E. side, is a small redoubt for guns, and in the hollow to the left between the fort and this redoubt, are several buildings, such as magazines for powder and other stores.

These works have been built during the early part of the Bednore government, and when Hyder Alli took Bednore, the Rance made her escape, and fled to this droog, but was pursued and taken.

Having remained on the top of this droog to the 4th March, for the purpose of fixing the meridian of the station in the south bastion of the upper fort, I marched on the 5th, and reached Woostara on the 6th. The first day's march was to Saurgoad, a small village with a bazar, about twelve miles easterly from Sultaun-pett. The road over mountainous ground, the first six miles being down a ghaut, at the foot of which is the gateway bounding the districts of Balaroyn-droog and Woostara. The second day's march not much better for about eight miles, when the country opens, and continues so to Woostara, the whole distance from Saurgoad being about twelve miles.

Woostara is an old fort on the side of some rising ground, commanded on every side, and particularly on that to which it inclines. From the ground where I encamped the whole interior of the work is seen. That ground is on the south side, about half a mile distant.

This work is also said to have been built during the government of Bednore, in which district it lies, and the same district extends about three miles more During the flourishing period of the Bednore government the countries of Canara and Soondah were all included in it. These districts were subject to the roys of Beejenagur till the year 1542, when this government was founded by Chinapa Gower, to whom it was made over by Sedashun Roy.

From Woostara to Bailoor is the great road, through an open and delightful country. Bailoor is remarkable for its pagodas, and the most exquisite workmanship in the sculpture of the different figures. It is said to be the most ancient pagoda in Mysore.

APHORISMS FROM HINDU WRITERS.

THE friendship of a good man is not easily interrupted, and if lost is soon regained : a golden bowl is not easily broken, but if broken is soon repaired; whilst an earthen bowl is quickly broken and incapable of repair.

The heart of an excellent man often resembles the coco-nut, hard without, with refreshing juice and delicious food within. The vicious resemble the jujube, which is soft without, but contains a stone.

Men are not naturally friends or enemics : friendship and enmity arise from circumstances.

It can never be safe to unite with an enemy water, though heated, will still extinguish fire.

A guest should be entertained without inquiring into his merits.

He who has lived many years we call aged; but the wise man is older than he.

A wise man will never be the leader of a party, for if the affairs of the party be successful, all will be equally sharers; and if unsuccessful, the leader alone will be dis-

Little things should not be despised. many straws united may bind an elephant.

Danger should be feared when distant, and braved when present.

Of all precious things, knowledge is the most valuable: other tiches may be stolen, or diminished by expenditure; but knowledge is immortal; the greater the expenditure the greater the increase; and it defies the power of the thief.

Religion is the ladder by which men ascend to heaven.

Neither a king, nor a minister, nor a wife, nor a person's hair, nor his nails, look well out of their places.

Every one looking downwards becomes impressed with ideas of his own greatness; but looking upwards feels his own littleness.

Kings, women, and climbing plants, love those that are near them.

The lustre of a virtuous character cannot be defaced, nor the vices of the vicious ever become lucid: a jewel preserves its lustre though trodden in the dirt; but a brass pot, though placed upon the head, remains brass still.

ANALYSIS OF THE CODE OF MENU.

(Continued from p. 447.)

THE eighth chapter of the Code, "On Judicature, and on Law, Private and Criminal," is the largest, in point of dimensions, and by far the most curious and important.

The system of Hindu law herein recognized is arranged under eighteen principal heads or titles, viz. 1, debt, on loans for consumption; 2, deposits, and loans for use; 3, sale without ownership; 4, partnership concerns; 5, subtraction of what has been given; 6, non-payment of wages; 7, non-performance of agreements; 8, rescission of sale and purchase; 9, disputes between master and servant; 10, contests respecting boundaries; 11, slander; 12, assault; 13, larceny; 14, robbery and other violence; 15, adultery; 16, altercation between man and wife, and their several duties; 17, the law of inheritance; 18, gaming with dice and living creatures. These eighteen titles are declared to be "the groundwork of all judicial procedure in this world."

Mr. Mill, in an able disquisition on the laws of the Hindus, to which he has devoted a chapter of his History of British India, has very fully investigated this part of the Code of Menu, "the most celebrated, perhaps, of all the compends of Hindu law." Of the arrangement which has just been quoted, he delivers the following opinion:

It is not easy to conceive a more rude and defective attempt at the classification of laws than what is here presented. The most essential and obvious distinctions are neglected and confounded. Though no arrangement would appear more natural, and more likely to strike even an uncultivated mind, than the division of laws into civil and penal, we find them mixed and blended together in the code of the Hindus. The first nine of the heads or titles refer to civil law; the 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th to criminal law; the 16th and 17th return to civil, and the 18th to criminal; while the 10th relates partly to the one and partly to the other. Another ground of division, well calculated, as being exceedingly obvious, to strike an uncultivated mind, is the distinction of persons and things. This was the groundwork of the arrangement bestowed upon the Roman laws; it is the arrangement which continues to prevail in the English, rude as it is, at once the effect and the cause of confusion. It will be seen, however, that even this imperfect attempt at a rational division was far above the Hindus.

As in our analysis we do not purpose, but studiously avoid, entering into a critical discussion of the code (which is a subject too comprehensive for the limits of a periodical publication), we make no further remarks upon this opinion of Mr. Mill, than that we do not concur with him in his humble estimate of the merits of the arrangement adopted by the Hindu legislator, nor in thinking the other modes of division which he has mentioned, as likely to occur even to an ancient writer upon "codification," much less "to strike an uncultivated mind." The distinction between civil and penal laws is not always clear; and Mr. Mill confesses, in another place, that in the division of rights adopted by the English lawyers, into those of persons and those of things, there is "not only confusion and ambiguity, but gross absurdity." It can, therefore, be hardly predicated of the distinction he mentions, that it is exceedingly obvious. Dr. Robertson, in his Historical Disquisition concerning India, has erred in the opposite extreme, by stating that "the articles of which the Hindu code is composed are arranged in natural and luminous order." The truth lies between these two opinions.

Passing over, for the present, the introductory passages in this chapter, which which relate to the administration of the law, we proceed to the exposition given of the respective titles; and first in regard to debt. A creditor may not only sue his debtor in court, but may recover his property by other means, namely, by the mediation of friends, by artful management, by distress, or by "legal force;" the king must not rebuke a creditor for thus retaking his own property, but must ratify such payment by the debtor. In a suit for a debt, which the debtor denies, the latter, if the debt be proved by the evidence of a witness who was present at the place of the loan, or by other evidence, is punishable with a small fine in addition to the amount of the debt. Three witnesses are, in another place, required before the judge can decide the cause. Delay on the part of the plaintiff is punishable corporally, or by a fine of double the sum claimed; and the defendant, if he plead not within three fortnights, is condemned in double the amount of the debt.

The qualifications of witnesses in suits for debt, as well as in other causes, are defined with that minuteness, and with all those peculiar features of eccentricity, of which this code furnishes so many examples. The exceptions as to the competency of witnesses are very numerous. Amongst the persons disqualified are kings, mean artificers, priests deeply learned in the scripture, decrepid men. "wretches of the lowest mixed class, &c. Witnesses may be temporarily disqualified, as when extremely grieved, intoxicated, tormented with hunger or thirst, oppressed with fatigue, or inflamed with wrath. Women are permitted to give evidence only for women,* except on failure of witnesses duly qualified, which authorizes the admission of certain other excepted testimony. "In all cases of violence, theft, adultery, defamation and assault, the judge must not examine too strictly the competence of witnesses," Previous to examination, the judge is to address the witnesses as follows: "What ve know to have been transacted in the matter before us, between the parties reciprocally, declare at large and with truth; for your evidence in this case is required." A faithful witness attains the highest fame below, and exalted beatitude hereafter; but a false witness shall be fast bound in the cords of Varuna (the god of the waters), be tormented during a hundred transmigrations, and sink headlong to a region of horror. Then follow several verses, in which truth is inculcated in a just and not inelegant manner:

By truth is a witness cleared from sin; by truth is justice advanced: truth must, therefore, be spoken by witnesses of every class.

The soul is its own witness; the soul itself is its own refuge; offend not thy conscious soul, the supreme internal witness of men!

The sinful have said in their hearts, "none sees us." Yes, the gods distinctly see them; and so does the spirit within their breasts.

The guardian deities of the firmament, of the earth, of the waters, of the human heart, of the moon, of the sun, and of fire, of punishment after death, of the winds, of night, of both twilights, and of justice, perfectly know the state of all spirits clothed with bodies.

The fruit of every virtuous act thou hast done, O good man, since thy birth, shall depart from thee to day, if thou deviate in speech from the truth.

O friend to virtue, that supreme spirit which thou believest one and the same with thyself, resides in thy bosom perpetually, and is an all-knowing inspector of thy goodness or of thy wickedness.

The gods are acquainted with no better mortal in this world than the man, of whom the intelligent spirit which pervades his body has no distrust when he prepares to give evidence.

The

* Female understandings, it is said, are apt to waver: but this circumstance should make them hable to equal suspicion in all cases.

The mischief done by judicial perjury is then described with all the fanciful precision peculiar to this code: e.g. by false testimony concerning cattle a witness kills (or, as the gloss has it, "incurs the guilt of killing") five of his kinsmen; concerning kine, ten; concerning horses, a hundred; concerning the human race, a thousand.

There is a precept in this part of the code which has been the subject of much animadversion, and is doubtless calculated to work serious injury in the Hindu mind: "In some cases, a giver of false evidence from a pious motive, even though he know the truth, shall not lose a seat in Heaven: such evidence wise men call the speech of the gods. Whenever the death of a man, who had not been a grievous offender,* either of the servile, the commercial, the military, or the sacerdotal class, would be occasioned by true evidence, from the known rigour of the king, even though the fault arose from inadvertence or error, falsehood may be spoken: it is even preferable to truth." This is the only case, be it remembered, in which "benevolent falsehood" is specifically sanctioned; and even in this case it is considered as a sin—a "venial sin"—for which sacrifices and expiatious are prescribed.

Witnesses who refuse to give evidence, unless disabled by illness, are to be mulcted in the whole amount of the debt in dispute, and a tenth part of it in addition. "The witness, who has given evidence, and to whom, within seven days, there happens disease, fire, or the death of a kinsman, shall be condemned to pay the debt and a fine." Amongst a superstitious people, like the Hindus, such an absurd law is not without its good effects in counteracting perjury.

Vain oaths, that is, according to the comment, oaths not taken in a court of justice, are strictly forbidden; but the legislator adds, characteristically, that to women, or in the case of grass or fruit caten by a cow, or of wood taken for sacrifice, or of a promise made for the preservation of a Brahmen, "it is no deadly sin to take a light oath."

The form of swearing witnesses differs for the different classes: "let the judge cause a priest to swear by his veracity; a soldier by his horse or clephant, and his weapons; a merchant by his kine, grain, and gold; a mechanic or servile man, by imprecating on his own head, if he speak falsely, all possible crimes; or, on great occasions, let him cause the party to hold fire, or to dive under water, or severally to touch the heads of his children and wife: he, whom the blazing fire burns not, whom the water soon forces up, or who meets with no speedy misfortune, must be held veracious in his testimony on oath."

The writer then lays down the rules by which false witnesses are to be punished, which are governed by the motives of the witness: the highest scale of punishment is awarded to the witness who speaks falsely through lust; the fine is 2,500 panas of copper, now equal to about £4 sterling. Moreover, corporal infliction and banishment seem prescribed as punishments for perjury, in case the offender is unable to pay a fine, and the parts of the body on which the torture is to fall are specified. The connexion between this species of punishment and the crime of perjury is not indeed expressly indicated; and Mr. Mill has assumed that it does not exist; though the alternative, "pay or suffer," occurs in the gloss. He observes: "while perjury, one of the most mischievous of crimes, and one against which an adequate motive is very difficult to create, is punished only with fine, and in its most aggravated cases with banishment; the crime of obtaining goods on false pretences is punished with mutilation and even with death." A judgment obtained through false evidence minutation and it plainly appears from this part of the code, that perjury <sub>15</sub> account vice amongst the ancient, as it is amongst the modern, Hindus.

* These and the succeeding words in stalles are supplied by the gloss.

In order to fix with precision the value of the amercements in cases of debt. the code specifies the relative proportion of the different weights used by men "for the purpose of worldly business." The integral or lowest point in this enumeration is the trasarénu, which is described as "the very small mote which may be discerned in a sun-beam passing through a lattice," eight of which are supposed equal in weight to one minute poppy seed. A variety of gradations intervene between this weight and the pana, which is equivalent to 103,680 trasarénus. As the ractica, or seed of the gunjà (abrus precatorius), is declared to contain 1,296 trasarénus, and as that seed weighs one grain five-sixteenths. the estimated weight of "a mote in the sun-beam" must be very nearly the fifticth part of what the moneyers in England call a mite, which is the twentieth part of a grain troy.

Under the second title, on loans for use, the subject of interest is treated of. The rate of interest recognized as legal varies according to the class of the borrower: if he be a priest he is to pay two per cent. per month; if a soldier, three; if a merchant, four; if a servile man, five per cent. per month; which is the utmost limit. Where a pledge is given, the interest is restricted to an eightieth part of a hundred by the month."

In regard to pledges, the law is precise: if the pledge be beneficial, i. e. to be used for the benefit of the lender, the latter has no other interest on the loan; the pawnee may not, at any time, sell the pledge, but must deliver it up to the borrower, when he offers to redeem it, or pay him the original price of it. No lapse of time destroys a pawner's title to his pledge. The owner of a chattel, not being a pledge, who sees it enjoyed by others for ten years, whilst he, though present, says nothing, loses his property in it. From this law are excepted boundaries of land, the property of an infant, female slaves, the wealth of a king, and of a learned Brahmen. "The fool who secretly uses a pledge without the assent of the owner, shall give up half of his interest, as a compensation for such use." Compound interest is forbidden: but if, at the renewal of the obligation for a debt, the borrower cannot pay the interest due, it may be inserted in the renewed contract as part of the

Under this head of loans for use, is included interest on " safe-carriage," or what we term insurance; and it is provided, that "whatever interest shall be settled by men well acquainted with sea-voyages or journies by land, with times and with places, such interest shall have legal force:" thus excepting, as we do, transactions of this nature, where risk is incurred, from the law which limits the amount of interest, considering the premium in such cases, in the phrase of the Roman law, pretium periculi.

Some doubt exists, it appears, in regard to the precise meaning of the word (chacravridd'hi) here translated "safe-carriage." The same word, Mr. Haughton observes, is elsewhere used in this code in the sense of "compound interest," with its usual import; and he gives Mr. Colebrooke's quotation from the gloss of Chandéswara, who considers that the word implies "wheel-interest," not "wheel-carriage," as Cullúca interprets it. By "wheel-interest," Chandéswara understands "compound interest." Both the comments, however, vary from the text, which, taken entire, and allowed to furnish its contextual interpretation, confirms, in our opinion, the sense put upon the word by Sir Wm. Jones.

A surety who fails to render the person of the debtor, must pay the debt; and the judge may compel even his heirs to discharge it, should the surety die; this seems to be only in cases where the surety was guaranteed by the debtor.

When the debtor is not of a higher caste than the creditor, he may discharge the claims of the latter by personal labour.

Deposits are to be restored, without alteration, to the owner. As it necessarily happens, from the very nature of the transaction, that there may be a failure of witnesses in a suit for the recovery of a deposit, the legislator resorts to an expedient to supply that defect, which, one might imagine, would be too simple, or rather too puerile, to occur even to the rudest people. The judge is directed to deposit, by the artful contrivance of spies, some valuable commodity with the defendant; if he restore it in the same shape and manner in which it was bailed, he is to be absolved; if otherwise, he is to be compelled to pay the value of both deposits. Fraudulently obtaining the goods of another is punishable with death.

Sale without ownership is treated as a theft: the bargain is held to be null, and the seller is liable to a fine, if a kinsman of the owner; otherwise, to the punishment due to larceny. Where a chattel stolen is purchased in open market, the purchaser, by producing the vendor, acquires the absolute property. If the vendor cannot be produced, the chattel must be restored to the original owner.

Under this head of bargain and sale, occurs the law respecting marriage, which is treated as a contract of the same sort as the transfer of a commodity from one to another for a valuable consideration. The law* runs thus: "one commodity, mixed with another, shall never be sold as unmixed; nor a bad commodity as good; nor less than agreed on; nor any thing kept at a distance or concealed, lest some defect in it should be discovered. If, after the damsel has been shewn, another be offered to the bridegroom, who had purchased leave to marry her from her next kinsman, he may become the husband of both for the same price. The kinsman, who gives a damsel in marriage, baving first openly told her blemishes, shall suffer no punishment." Yet, in the third chapter of this code, we have seen that venal marriages are prohibited in the most solemn manner!

Under the fourth head, "concerns amongst partners," the division of the sacrificial fees accruing to priests furnishes a rule by which allotments of shares are to be given to men who perform business in conjunction.

The fifth head, relating to gifts, is disposed of in an equally summary manner, with reference to religious offerings.

The next head relates to wages: a hired servant who fails, through indolence, to perform his work, is to be fined. Even if he do not complete his work through sickness, his whole wages are forfeited.

Non-performance of agreements is punished by fine or banishment.

Rescission of sale and purchase is authorized. A purchaser or seller may rescind his contract within ten days, giving or taking back the thing purchased or sold. Here again we find rules specifically relating to bargains of marriage.

Under the head relating to disputes between master and servant the rules apply to agricultural and pastoral occupations only. The rules are very minute and not inequitable. We find that compulsory tillage of ground was in force at the date of this code: "if land be injured," says the law, "by the fault of the farmer himself (as if he fails to sow it in good time), he shall be fined ten times as much as the king's share of the crop that might otherwise have been raised; but only five times as much if it was the fault of his servants without his knowledge."

Boundaries are required to be formed by planting of trees, raising mounds of earth, and by concealing substances beneath the ground; and when a contest arises respecting a boundary, the king is to ascertain the limits in a particular month, by means of the aforesaid, or by natural marks, or by long-continued possession, conformably to the testimony of witnesses. In the absence of all evidence, the king is himself to settle a bound-line.

Slander and abuse are punishable with fine, if the party vilified be of equal or lower caste; but a once-born man who insults a twice-born is to have his tongue slit, or hot oil is to be dropped into his mouth or car, or an iron style red hot thrust into his mouth. In cases of mutual abuse by a priest and a soldier, the former pays the lowest amercement only; the latter the middle-most.

In regard to assault and battery, where the offence is committed by a lowborn man against a superior, the punishment is slitting or cutting the offending member: the details of this law are given with a precision which is truly disgusting. Fine and banishment are the penalties for the offence when committed against equals. Blows in general, given either to man or beast, when attended with much pain, are punishable according to the lex talionis. For killing a man (i, e, without design), a fine equal to that for theft shall be instantly set; half that amount for large brute animals; for killing very young cattle, the fine is 200 panas, &c. "A wife, a son, a servant, a pupil, and a (younger) whole brother, may be corrected, when they commit faults, with a rope or the small shoot of a cane; but on the back part only of their bodies, and not on a noble part by any means." Some writers have been scandalized at this sanction given to the infliction of corporal chastisement upon a wife. Mr. Haughton says: "in opposition to the dictum of the lawgiver, I feel happy in borrowing a note of Mr. Colebrooke's (Hindu Digest, ii. 209) on this very verse: 'May I quote a maxim of no less authority?-strike not, even with a blossom, a wife guilty of a hundred faults." According to a provision in the second chapter of this code, where two texts clash, both are to be held valid!

The various kinds of theft and robbery are punishable by fine, imprisonment, corporal chastisement, or mutilation. "For stealing men of high birth, and women above all, and the most precious gems, the thief deserves capital punishment." The distinction between theft and robbery is this: if the taking be violent, and in the sight of the owner, it is robbery; if privately, in his absence, it is only theft. The law also provides that the limb with which a thief commits the offence shall be amputated. It is a remarkable feature in this code, that whereas, in general, the scale of punishment increases with the subordinate rank of the offender, especially when the crime is committed against a superior, in respect to theft, the scale ascends in proportion to the rank. Thus the fine of a Súdra for theft is eight-fold; of a Vaisya, sixteen fold; of a Cshatriya, two and thirty fold; and of a Bráhmen, from four and sixty fold to double that rate; and where another man of lower birth would be fined one pana, the king shall be fined a thousand; "and he shall give the fine," adds the gloss, "to the priests, or cast it into the river."

Adultery is considered as a crime because it causes "a mixture of classes among men; thence arises violation of duties; and thence is the root of felicity quite destroyed." Overt acts of adultery (as they are termed) are punish-diatic Journ. Vol. 25, No. 150.

5 H able;

able; such are the indications of adulterous inclination, sending flowers or perfume to another's wife, &c. Hence it appears that the Hindu legislator wished to impose a penalty upon the commission of the crime "in the heart." The actual offence is severely punished. "Should a wife, proud of her family and the great qualities of her kinsmen, actually violate the duty which she owes to her lord, let the king condemn her to be devoured by dogs in a place much frequented; and let him place the adulterer on an iron bed well heated. under which the executioners throw logs continually, till the sinful wretch be there burned." This extreme penalty seems awarded only in cases where the adulterer is of the lowest and the adulteress of the highest class. The crime in other circumstances is punished in various ways, but the details are too indelicate to be given. Brahmens are exempted from capital punishment, "Never shall the king slay a Brahmen, though convicted of all possible crimes; let him banish the offender from his realm, but with all his property secure and his body unhurt: no greater crime is known on earth than slaying a Brahmen: and the king, therefore, must not even form in his mind an idea of killing a priest."

The remaining three heads of law are discussed in the succeeding chapters of the code. The present chapter closes with sundry miscellaneous provisions, thrown together without order or coherence. For example: after specifying certain persons who are to be exempt from taxation, and pointing out the characters whom the king is to honour, there follows this verse: "Let a washerman wash clothes by little and little on a smooth board of sálmalí wood (bambu heptaphyllium); let him never mix clothes with clothes, nor suffer any (but the owner) to wear them."

Various duties are then inculcated upon the king. He is to regulate market prices, adjust weights and measures, fix tolls, and order each man to perform the duty allotted to his class.

The following three verses contain some curious provisions in regard to the law of slavery:

There are servants of seven sorts; one made captive under a standard, one maintained in consideration of service, one born of a female slave in the house, one sold, or given, or inherited from ancestors, and one enslaved by way of punishment.

Three persons, a wife, a son, and a slave, are declared by law to have no wealth exclusively their own: the wealth which they may earn is acquired for the man to whom they belong.

A Bráhmen may seize without hesitation the goods of his Súdra slave; for as that slave can have no property, his master may take his goods.

THE CASE OF MR. ERSKINE OF BOMBAY.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sir: In a preceding letter, which I took the liberty of addressing to you (p. 452), I fully explained the real merits of Mr. Erskine's case, and the nature of the defence of his conduct, which had been printed and circulated for the perusal of his friends. But a correct opinion respecting this subject cannot be formed without adverting to some circumstances which took place after Mr. Erskine's dismissal; and I am, therefore, induced to request that you will do me the favour of admitting the following remarks into your journal.

Mr. Erskine was removed from the situations which he held in the Recorder's Court on the 18th June 1823, and the causes of his dismissal were thus publicly announced in a speech from the bench :- "Nor will the court say, whether Mr. Erskine be guilty or not of a voluntary participation in the profits of these frauds and extortions, as the case may yet come before a jury, and it would not be proper to anticipate the verdict of a jury; without, however, pronouncing upon this subject, there is more than sufficient to call upon the court to dismiss Mr. Erskine from all the offices he holds under it. There is abundant evidence of a carelessness about the interests of the public, as far as they are concerned with his offices, and of the grossest and most criminal neglect." In reading this passage, and in adverting to the cool, impartial, and dispassionate manner in which judges in England deliver their decisions, and to the anxious solicitude with which they restrict their remarks to the real merits of the case before them, and abstain from imputing any blame not proved to the party accused, or even aggravating the culpability proved by extraneous matter, it will naturally be concluded that this judgment must rest on sufficient grounds. But even to this day it has never been established by any public investigation or evidence, that either frauds or extortions had been actually committed in the court of small causes of which Mr. Erskine was then clerk; and it was also well known to the Recorder's Court, that for the three preceding years Mr. Erskine's state of ill-health, and other avocations of more importance, had compelled him to relax in his personal superintendence of that office, and to leave the business of the court to be almost entirely conducted by his native head clerk, as he had no European deputy.*

But, notwithstanding the notorious fact of the business of this court having for three years been almost entirely conducted by the head clerk, of which the Recorder was well aware, and of the publicly expressed causes of dismissal-namely, carclessness and neglect, the Recorder assumed throughout the whole of that speech that the acts done, or supposed to have been done, by the clerk, were in reality committed by Mr. Erskine, or for his benefit. It must, however, be self-evident that carelessness and neglect are the strongest presumptions that the acts of the servant were not attributable to the master; nor can it be denied that ill-health is such a legitimate excuse as must divest even these omissions of either grossness or criminality. But it was no doubt competent for the Recorder's Court to consider them as sufficient grounds for dismissing Mr. Erskine from his situation as clerk of the Court of Small Causes; though they certainly did not afford the slightest grounds for depriving him of that of master in equity, as not even the Recorder himself ever asserted or hinted that any irregularities had been discovered, covered, or even supposed to exist, in this office. In that speech, therefore, the Recorder ought to have confined his remarks entirely to the abuses which were alleged to have occurred in the Court of Small Causes, in consequence of Mr. Erskine's carelessness and neglect, and to have abstained from imputing culpability to any person until he had been placed on his trial, and the culpability established by the verdict of a jury. It must, consequently, be evident that, in the accusing Mr. Erskine in terms too plain to be misunderstood, of extortion, fraud, oppression, and corruption, the Recorder deviated entirely from that line of conduct which is prescribed to an English judge by both precedent and law.

* Here follows an extract from Mr. Erskine's printed " case," which is already given in p. 457.—Ep.

It must, also, be remembered that Mr. Erskine had been examined on interrogatories, and that the law says that if the defendant clears himself by his answers, the complaint must be totally dismissed. As, consequently, Mr. Erskine had been so examined, and as he had then solemnly declared that he was ignorant of the existence of any irregularities in the Court of Small Causes. and that he had never knowingly benefited in any manner by any sums of money improperly received in his office, his innocence of all that was alleged against him, except neglect, which he admitted, was fully established by that precise and only kind of proof which the laws of his country in such cases require. It might, therefore, have been expected that all farther inquisition into his conduct would have been terminated by his dismissal. But, on the contrary, it was not without the utmost difficulty that he obtained permission to leave Bombay, though it was well known to every member of the Recorder's Court that his detention would inevitably occasion a fatal termination to the illness under which he had so long laboured. But the urgency of the case at last compelled the court to grant permission, under the condition, however, that Mr. Erskine should give security in four lacs of rupees; and it was not, until after several remonstrances with respect to the exorbitancy of this sum, that it was reduced to two lacs-Mr. Erskine's personal bond for 100,000 rupces, and two securities in 50,000 rupces each.* That this amount was excessive, and consequently illegal, must have been obvious from the slightest inquiry; because the sum-total of all the fees received by the clerk of the Court of Small Causes did not, on an average, exceed 13,000 rupees annually. Consequently the amount of the security was sufficient for the refunding of the whole of these fees for fifteen years, had every fee during that period been improperly received, and thus extended the retrospective precaution against supposed abuses five or six years beyond the date on which Mr. Erskine was appointed clerk of this court. Nor must it be forgotten that this amount was demanded after the Recorder had been for four months carefully examining every book and paper belonging to Mr. Erskine's office, as well as his head clerk, who had been conveyed after examination on points connected with this inquiry, from the Recorder's chambers to the common gaol, and there committed to close confinement.

The purpose, however, for which this security was required did not appear until four months after Mr. Erskine's dismissal, and three months after his departure from Bombay. For it was not until the 21st October 1823 that the Recorder's • The amount of the fees received by the clerk of the Court of Small Causes, on an average, never exceeded 13,000 rupees annually—3tr. Erskine held this situation for nearly ton years—and the Master in Equity Gound, on the principles established, or pack facto, by Sir Edward West himself, and in the absence of Mr. Erskine, that one-throd only of these fees had been improperly charged. Consequently, the utmost amount that ought to have been in justice demanded as security, was Mr. Erskine's personal bond for 30,000 rupees, and two securities in 15,000 rupees each.

Recorder's Court gave orders to the Master in Equity to tax all bills of costs which should be presented to him by suitors in the Court of Small Causes for the two years preceding the 18th June 1823, and to Mr. Erskine's solicitor to publish three times in the newspapers an advertisement,* in English and the native languages, requiring the attendance of the suitors for that purpose. As, however, this court acts as a court of conscience, and strict adherence to forms of proceeding is not therefore required, no written rules had ever been established for its observance, and even the table of fees did not contain all the fees which had, from the institution of the court, been sanctioned at different times by different recorders. The suitors, also, had never previously applied for a taxation of costs, and, consequently, when ordered for the first time in Mr. Erskine's case, the principles by which it ought to be regulated could not be correctly ascertained from usage, precedent, or written documents. The Recorder's Court, therefore, was obliged to frame instructions for this purpose, ex post facto, arbitrarily, and without being in possession of the requisite information; and it was in conformity to such obviously inaccurate, if not unjust, instructions, that this taxation was conducted by the Master in Equity. Mr. Erskine was absent, his head clerk had been subjected to several weeks close imprisonment, and the correctness of the order of the Recorder's Court was not allowed to be called in question; and under such circumstances, it cannot excite surprise that the Master in Equity found that, on an average of fifty bills, one-third of the costs had been improperly charged.

But it is remarkable that, though the average annual number of suitors in the Court of Small Causes may be estimated at 600, amounting in two years to 1,200, fifty suitors only presented their bills to the Master in Equity, and of these bills twenty-three, notwithstanding the period specified in the public advertisements, were dated prior to the 16th June 1821, and one even dated on the 17th January 1814. Instead, therefore, of the two years to which it was restricted by these advertisements, this retrospective taxation was extended to nine years and a half; and this disregard of public faith was only equalled by the unfairness of the principles by which the taxation was directed to be conducted: for the two leading principles were, that all fees not specified in the table of fees, and all the established charges for subpænatickets and notices, the service of which could not be proved, should be disallowed. But the Recorder knew that this table was imperfect, because he states in his speech of the 18th June 1823 :- " A few weeks after my arrival here I found, from the rules of court, that half a rupee only was to be charged by the sealer for every scal affixed to proceedings in the Small Cause Court, but the sealer was receiving one whole rapec. I inquired of Mr. Woodhouse, the late sealer, the reason of the practice; he told me that one rupce had been always received, but did not know whether this rule had been altered. I then referred to Mr. Sandwith, as being one of the oldest practitioners of the court; he could give me very little information, excepting that it had been received for many years." Mr. Erskine, also, when examined on interrogatories, had thus deposed before the Recorder :- "When there are a number of causes in court, there will sometimes be a hundred, or more than a hundred, subpœna-tickets alone, and double the number of notices" [required iu one day]. Whence it was self-evident that it was utterly impossible to ascertain who the officer was who served any one particular subpœna-ticket or notice, notice, or what persons, particularly among the class of people who are alone suitors in this court, might have been present at its service. To assume, therefore, that the table of fees was perfect, when the Recorder well knew that it was imperfect, and to require, under these circumstances, proof of such service, when the trial and decision of the cause afforded the most unquestionable evidence that the parties and witnesses must have attended and pleaded, were acts devoid of the slightest semblance of equity and justice.

* This advertisement appeared in the Nos. of the Bombay Counter of the 3th, 15th, and 22d Nov. 1923.

The unfairness, however, and illegality of this taxation were so obvious. that, as soon as it was opposed by the constituted attornies of Mr. Ersking the Recorder's Court gave orders to the Master in Equity to discontinue it. and also, though ten only of the fifty suitors, whose bills had been then taxed. had recovered the sums overcharged, to suspend all farther re-payment of the costs which had been in these instances disallowed. The Master in Equity, in consequence, addressed this letter to Mr. Erskine's solicitor:- "I am authorized to request you will postpone the payment for the present to suitors in the Small Cause Court of any further sums disallowed on taxation, as the constituted attornies of William Erskine, Esq. are desirous of attending at the office of the clerk of the Small Cause Court to examine the records, in order to ascertain when the charges disallowed in Mr. Erskine's bills, as not sanctioned by the table of fees, were first made." But, though four years have now elapsed, no orders have been given for the continuation of these repayments; and the result, therefore, of this taxation, even to the comparatively small extent to which it was carried, has hitherto remained inoperative. The fortune, however, of Mr. Erskine has materially suffered in consequence of his having been obliged to leave funds in this country, in order to cover the exorbitant amount of security demanded from him by the Recorder's Court, as a very considerable depreciation in the rate of exchange took place not long after his departure from Bombay.

From these, and the remarks contained in my preceding letter, it will be evident that the case of Mr. Erskine is of a most unprecedented and anomalous nature. For in it one and the same same person, and that person invested with high authority, has acted as accuser, counsel for the prosecution, jury, and judge; that after a secret and inquisitorial course of proceeding for three months, the only evidence adduced in support of the final decision is the examination of the party accused; and even this is not used fairly and impartially: but all that can, by the most strained implication or construction, be made appear unfavourable to Mr. Erskine, is carefully dwelt upon, and all that deposes in his vindication is, notwithstanding an express rule of law to the contrary, most studiously suppressed; and that, not satisfied with his dismissal, a punishment most assuredly more than adequate for carelessness and neglect occasioned by long ill-health, proceedings prejudicial to his character and fortune are in his absence commenced of so questionable a nature, that they are desisted from as soon as opposed. It is not, however, necessary, for the purpose of fully evincing the perfect innocence of Mr. Erskine, to scrutinize the motives and causes which may have given to this case so very peculiar a character. But it is indispensable to remark, most particularly, that every imputation alleged against his conduct rests solely and entirely on the bare assertion of Sir Edward West; as such serious charges as extortion, fraud, oppression, and corruption, have been to this moment allowed to remain uninvestigated. Sir Edward West, therefore, has placed himself in a singular but obvious dilemma. For these charges must be either true or false: if false, he acted contrary to the duty of an English judge, in aspersing the character of Mr. Erskine from the seat of justice; and if true, why was so great a public delinquent permitted to escape the punishment which he justly merited? Because it cannot be said that the absolutely necessary departure of Mr. Erskine from Bombay prevented any farther criminal proceeding; since the head clerk, who was the person who actually charged and received all sums of monies paid into the Court of Small Causes, remained in Bombay, and his trial would have clearly shewn whether or not any culpability was imputable to Mr. Erskine.

the

In this case, therefore, Sir Edward West appears * * * * *
It must necessarily follow, that not the shadow of suspicion ought to attach to the conduct of Mr. Erskine in consequence of such unsupported and interested accusations, invalidated as they are by Mr. Erskine's oath, and by his high character so strongly borne testimony to in the annexed address.*

It need scarcely be observed, that my information respecting this case is derived from Mr. Erskine and his friends; and that I have no knowledge of what may be urged on the opposite side of the question. But a writer, who advocates it, published in the Bombay Gazette of the 17th October last, a document headed—" List of Bills of Costs of the late Clerk of the Court of Small Causes [Mr. Erskine] taken indiscriminately, and taxed by W. Fenvick,

* To W. Erskine, Esq.

Sir: Your sudden and unexpected return to your native country has prevented the expression of our sentiments respecting late events previous to your departure. But it has been with the sincerest regret that we have viewed a course of judicial proceedings which, by aggravating a previous debilitated state of health, have terminated in depriving us of the pleasure and benefit of your society.

Few of us have had the happiness of your acquaintance during the whole period of nineteen years that you have resided here. But early intimacy, or the report of our predecessors, impressed all of us with such an estimation of your character as inspired our respect and esteem; and which subsequent intercourse has to the last moment increased and confirmed. In public life we have observed you perform the arduous duties of various important situations with the most concillating address, the greatest ability, the strictest integrity, and the most benevolent but impartial pusice. In private life we have been delighted with the most engaging urbanity, the correctest feelings of a gentleman, the nicest principles of honour, and the loftiest sentiments of disinterestedness. In literary pursults your animating example diffused a love of literature, and your intimate acquaintance with the learning of the west and the east, enabled you to communicate that information which might have been elsewhere sought in vain, and to confer not only on many of us, but on others, the important benefit of your advice in the direction and amelioration of our pursuits and studies. But why should we dwell on those eninent accomplishments and qualifications which we so much admired, but of which we now lament the loss; when the high estimation in which you were held, and the sentiments of private regard with which you were honoured by the most distinguished characters in India, are so universally known?

It may, however, prove acceptable to you to be assured that, until the moment of your embarkation, these unfelgrad feelings of esteem and regard have experienced neither change nor diminution. We too well know the scrious and long state of ill-health, and the pressure of more important duties, which prevented you from giving sufficient personal attention to an office of less consequence, and in which you had no reason to suppose that irregularities were likely to occur. We are only surprised, when we advert to the character of the natives, that after the most severe scrutiny so little has been discovered to which the name of abuses could possibly be applied. And though imputations tending to implicate you in the knowledge and participation of the profits derived from these abuses, have been attempted to be fixed on your character, still all the circumstances of the case, confirmed by the whole tenor of your past life, most satisfactorily evince that these imputations rest on no grounds whatever.

It is with mingled feelings of satisfaction and regret that we thus inadequately express our opinion of your character. We are proud of having enjoyed your acquaintance, but we lament that after a long and unblemished course of public duties, and the deserved acquisition of the highest reputation, you should have been, on slight suspicions, subjected to all the anxieties of an unusual mode of judicial proceedings. We, however, console ourselves with the hopes that your sudden departure will at least, by restoring your mind and body to repose, insure the complete re-establishment of your health; and that a trivial degree of negligence will not be doomed to suffer unredressed a punishment which criminal turpitude could alone deserve.

That these hopes may not be disappointed, and that you may long enjoy your native country, and in uninterrupted happiness, that high reputation and fair fame which an active life distinguished by every quality and every virtue which can adorn a man so justly entitles you, are the cordial wishes of those who, while they deeply regret the loss of your agreeable and instructive society, will ever remember you with sentiments of the sincerest esteem and regard.

We remain, &c.

Esq., Master in Equity, pursuant to order of Court;" and remarked with respect to it-" That paper will speak for itself, and establishes pretty clearly, by a rule-of-three question, that Mr. Erskine's robberies upon the public exceeded Rs. 2,000 monthly, &c." This document contained the result of this taxation by the Master in Equity in twenty-one causes; and to shew with what correctness the word indiscriminately has been used in the heading of this document, it is merely requisite to observe, that in these bills the items disallowed amount to one-half of the costs charged, while on the whole of the fifty bills taxed they amount to one-third only. To the remarks of this writer I replied, and with some difficulty obtained the insertion of my letter, in the Bombay Gazette of the 7th inst. In this I pointed out the erroneousness of the principles on which this taxation was conducted, and concluded by observing that "Giovanni, also, might have learned from the same source from whence he procured the document which he has published, that the overcharges, which the Master in Equity ascertained to have been improperly made, on the principles established, ex post facto, as before-mentioned, were refunded to ten only of these fifty suitors; and that he then received directions to suspend such further re-payment until farther orders." But though four years have now elapsed, such orders have never been given, and the effect of this taxation has in consequence remained inoperative. The retractation, consequently, of these instructions seems an admission of their inapplicability; and the merest inspection of the document produced by "Giovanni" will shew that the principles on which this taxation proceeded must have been erroncous: because, on an average of twenty-one causes, it is found that one-half of the costs have been improperly charged. Can it, therefore, be supposed, for a single moment, that the six preceding recorders under whom Mr. Erskine acted would have allowed such a system of extortion to exist in the Court of Small Causes?* To these strictures no answer has been yet returned; nor is it possible, I think, to explain why the Recorder's Court have taken no farther steps in the business, although it had been ascertained, on the principles laid down by it, ex post facto, that Mr. Erskine, during nine years and a half, must have exacted from the suitors in the Small Cause Court at least one-third more fees than what he was authorized to receive if this taxation be just and legal.

Before concluding, I cannot avoid adverting to the eulogium bestowed on Sir Edward West by Mr. Buckingham in the first article of the number of the Oriental Herald for February 1827; in which, among other equally welldeserved praises, he includes the having "bestowed upon his fellow-countrymen, in that land of despotism, as much of the freedom of the English press as can be enjoyed by law while the tyrannical and execrable power of arbitrary banishment without trial remains." I can scarcely believe that, when Mr. Buckingham was writing this article, he could possibly be ignorant that the dread of Sir Edward West's vengeance prevents the editors of newspapers in this place from publishing the most inoffensive remarks, if they have the remotest apparent allusion to the Recorder's or Supreme Court, or judges. So far, indeed, from Sir Edward West supporting the freedom of the press, he has so effectually terrified the editors and proprietors of the Bombay newspapers, that though the most false and injurious calumnics, and the most vulgar and ungentlemanlike personalities have appeared in the Bombay Gazette, unquestionably Under Sir Edward West, when recorder, Mr. Erskine had acted only four or five weeks previous to the commencement of inquiries into the supposed existence of abuses in this court.

unquestionably written by individuals * . *. no editor will admit into his paper a refutation of these aspersions, however cautiously and guardedly composed. Nor is the insertion of my letter in the Gazette of the 7th inst. any proof to the contrary, because I could not procure its publication until I authorized the editor to give up my name if necessary; and, even under this safeguard, as it might be thought, he has subsequently declined publishing any more of my letters. No better criterion, therefore, can there be for judging of the freedom of the press at Bombay than that letter, as it will at once shew what kind of compositions an editor thinks it dangerous to publish; for it was a reference to it and subsequent information, that induced the editor to consider the publication of my letters as attended with risk both to himself and the proprietors of the Gazette. But as that letter did not in any respect infringe the press regulations of government, the risk, consequently, could arise solely from the construction which might be put upon it by Sir Edward West: and the power which a court of justice has of proceeding by way of contempt, and thus avoiding the usual mode of bringing the accusation to trial before a jury. Nor, with the example of Mr. Erskine before him, can an editor be blamed for not wishing to expose himself to such proceedings.

Bombay, 29th November 1827.

I remain, &c. VINDEX.

REAL PROPERTY OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN INDIA.

THE following is an abstract of the bill brought in by Mr. Fergusson to explain and amend the law respecting real property belonging to British subjects and others within the jurisdiction of his Majesty's courts in India.

Whereas some doubts have arisen whether the real estates of British subjects and others (not being Malnomedans or Gentoos) situate within the jurisdiction of his Majisty's supreme courts in India, are liable as assets in the hands of executors and administrators, to the payment of the debts of their deceased owners: he it declared and enacted, &c. that whenever any British subject shall die, seised of or entitled to any teal estate in houses, &c. situate within, or being under the general jurisdiction of his Majesty's supreme courts of judicature at Fort William, &c.; or whenever any person (not being a Mahomedan or Gentoo) shall die, seised of or entitled to any such real estate, &c., such real estate is and shall be deemed assets in the hands of his or her executor or administrator, for the payment of his or her debts, whether by specialty or simple courtract.

That it is and shall be lawful for such executor or administrator of such British subject, or other person as aforesaid, to sell and dispose of such real estate for the payment of such debts as aforesaid, and to convey and assure the same estate to a purchaser.

That in any suit or action to be commenced and prosecuted in any of the said courts respectively, against such executor or administrator as aforesaid, for the recovery of any debt or demand due and owing by such tostator or intestate, such executor or administrator shall and may be charged with the full amount in value of such real estate as aforesaid, not exceeding the actual net proceeds of such estate when sold by the sheriff, as assets in the hands of such executor or administrator to be administered.

That in any such suit or action, it is and shall be lawful for the said courts to award and issue such writs of sequestration and execution against such real effects of such testator or intestate, in the hands of such executor or administrator as aforesaid, and to cause the same to be seized, &c.

That all conveyances and assurances of such real estates of such British subjects and other persons so dying seised or entitled as aforesaid (not being Mahomedans or Gentoos) situate within or being under the general or local jurisdiction of such courts respectively as aforesaid, horetofore made and executed by executors and administrators, are hereby confirmed.

Review of Books.

Letters addressed to a Young Person in India; calculated to afford Instruction for his Conduct in general, and more especially in his Intercourse with the Natives. By Lieut. Col. John Baiges, late Resident at Satara. London, 1828. 8vo. pp. 241.

This is a work which, though of an unpretending character, and written in a plain and familiar style, contains a vast deal of sterling sense, judicious advice, and sound observation. It deserves to be, and we trust it will become, a popular manual for young men entering the public service in India, and a companion to Sir John Malcolm's admirable "Notes of Instructions," which are very properly appended to these letters. The tendency of both publications is to correct certain habits of thinking in regard to the natives of India which are too frequent amongst young public servants, and to inculcate useful lessons for the regulation of their intercourse with them.

The utility of these letters is not, however, restricted to one class of readers; they abound with accurate and very interesting sketches of the institutions, the domestic economy, the character and peculiarities of the Hindus, drawn, not by a superficial observer, but by one who has had abundant opportunities of studying these matters, and who has evidently not suffered such opportunities to pass unimproved.

Considering the sort of connexion which subsists between England and India, such of our countrymen as have passed some years in the latter country cannot bestow a more acceptable gift upon the former, than by imparting the result of their experience with reference to whatever bears immediately upon the topic of governing that part of our empire. Antiquities, and literary topics, except in so far as they tend directly to enlighten our views with regard to the political condition and wants of the natives of India, are of comparatively subordinate importance.

These letters, Col. Briggs informs us, are what they purport to be, genuine epistles; they were written for the use of two young men entering public life in India, one in the military, the other in the civil service. They begin with the outset of both in their respective careers, and "as the mind and the views of the young civilian expand, the letters assume a graver tone, and, quitting the minutiae of forms and habits, to which he by degrees becomes familiar, topics of a more important nature are treated of, in which legislation and policy are discussed, and opinions founded on practical experience are freely compared with theory."

A prevailing subject in the letters, and a most important one, is the conduct to be observed by Europeans towards the natives. The writer takes occasion very often to dwell upon this subject, from a disaster which befel one of his young correspondents, the military officer, who came to India prejudiced against the Hindus. He condemns severely the practice of designating the natives by the contemptuous appellation of "black fellows," and he relates the following anecdote:

While on this subject I will just relate a circumstance which happened some years ago, connected with the epithet "black fellow," which ought to make you blush. You are aware that the art of ship-building has attained, under the conduct of natives alone, a degree of perfection which enables it to bear a fair comparison with the same art in England

The entire construction of vessels had been for many years conducted in Bombsy

Bombay under one Jeinsejee, a native Parsee, who, from being a common ship-carpenter, rose to become master builder in the Company's dock-yard; and in the year 1800 the first frigate built of teak for his Majesty's service was launched into her proper element. The vessel had been built solely by natives, and was a proud specimen of the perfection they had attained in their art. During the preparations for the launch, to which the governor and all the haval officers of his Majesty's service were invited, it is said Jemsejee, having walked once or twice around the vessel, and elated at her completion in so good style, determined to commemorate the event, which he did in the following manner. Having gone quietly below into the ship's hold, he caused these remarkable words to be carved on the inside of her kelson:—"This ship was built by a d—d black fellow, a.D. 1800." The circumstance was unknown for some years afterwards, until the vessel was brought into dock, and Jemsejee mentioned the fact, and pointed out the inscription.

The behaviour of some Europeans to native servants is a subject which calls for occasional animadversion from Col. Briggs, who furnishes some very useful rules for the conduct of the European on ordinary occasions of intercourse with the natives.

We are in reality grossly ignorant of the most common Indian habits, and not a day passes in which we are not unnecessarily offended at what we observe in them, without considering that scarcely an act of our own lives does not in some way or other wound their prejudices. I have already mentioned many instances in which our manners differ, and I shall endeavour to think of more. The bow, which we look upon as courteous, is described by a learned Mahomedan historian, speaking of the Portuguese mode of address, "as a monkey-like or apish salutation;" and yet, what should we think of the Javanese peasantry, who sit down as a mark of respect while a superior passes by?

Some gentlemen are so unreasonable as to expect all the natives they meet to salute them, more especially if they enter a room in which a native of respectability is sitting, when they require that he should rise and pay them that compliment. The practice in this respect varies in different parts of India, and no general rule can be given. In most instances a well-bred Mahomedan would offer you his chair, and refuse to sit, although you were a stranger; before you were yourself seated. The Hindoos, however, are by no means so polished as the Mahomedans, either in their manners or their language; but the honest bluntness of the middling classes puts an Englishman so much in mind of those of his own country, that he is disposed to forgive a want of covertesy after he has lived some time amongst them. Both Hindoos and Mahomedans, in the upper classes of society, have their rules of propriety as well established as among ourselves. No man of respectability thinks it proper to notice a stranger he may casually meet in another's house, until he has been introduced, after which all formality ceases.

The propensity to take offence, however, pervades both military men and civilians among ourselves, though the former seem more litigious than the latter, for two reasons; first, because they are more ignorant of the native customs; and secondly, because they are in the habit of exacting deference and respect from their soldiers, the only natives with whom they have much intercourse, and from whom they imbibe very strong but unjust prejudices against every other class. I once saw a remarkable instance of this exemplified in an officer who was living with me. We were walking together, and had occasion to cross a stream of water by a narrow plank bridge, near which were sitting several Bramins of respectability, performing their morning ablutions and devotions. One of them, who had occupied the path near the bridge, rose to let us pass, while another who was next him merely shuffled aside, and made room without rising. I passed on without observation, but my friend, irritated that he did not get up and salute him, kicked him into the stream, and called him in his own language an unmannerly brute. It proved to be the Hindoo judge of the court. In vain did I represent to my guest how ill he had behaved, and urge him to offer an apology, and I had much difficulty in preventing the Bramin from lodging a public complaint in the court against bim. him. Now this officer had been ten years in the army in India, and had never been one day absent from his regimental duty. He was a good soldier, and much beloved by his sepoys, to whom he was greatly attached; but he had a vulgar and ignorant aversion to Bramins in general, and he never used any other epithet towards them than that of "rascals:" though when asked to explain in what respect he had found them so, he always evaded the question by general assertions, that they imposed on the rest of the people; in other words, that being the priests, and the only men of education in the country, they availed themselves of these circumstances to exact deference and respect from the lower classes.

The nice attention which is required in treating the superstitious and fastidious prejudices of the people of India, who are even disgusted at seeing a wafer wetted in the mouth to put in a letter, is shewn in the following passage:

Only imagine, for instance, a magistrate sending an outcast with his badge of office into the house of a Bramin, to deliver a summons requiring his attendance in his court. The consequence would be, that the house must andergo a thorough cleansing from the pollution of his foot having passed the threshold, and the Bramin himself, if touched, would probably have to perform a penance, and pay some fee to the temple, before he could be admitted to enter it. A magistrate, therefore, who wanted to ruin or persecute any particular individual, might do it by merely requiring his frequent attendance in court. From the knowledge our judges and magistrates, and most civilians who have resided many years in the country, have of the aversion which the Hindoos feel towards the outcasts, there is little danger of any of the public servants being of this caste, yet it not unfrequently happens that young men like yourself, whom the natives see are training to become magistrates and rulers over them, commit very offensive mistakes. I have more than once seen young men (Europeans) both of the military and civil service, after admiring the agility and elasticity of the limbs of strolling tumblers, both male and female, a class for the most part of the lowest description and of the most profligate habits, go up and coress them, and begin talking and laughing with the females in a manner equally indelicate and improper, and in the eyes of a native of respectability positively disgusting. But without being aware of these distinctions, how is it possible for young men to discriminate? and even when they are, how few pay such attention to appearances as to observe them!

The description given in one of the letters of the mclas or fairs common in India is amusing; the remarkable accordance between these spectacles in Asia and Europe, notwithstanding the discrepancy in the manners of the respective continents, is a proof of the instinctive approximation of the habits and tastes of the vulgar all over the world.

The festival seems to level much of the distinctions of caste, and the separation of the sexes. Booths are erected on each side of a wide street, formed for the occasion on some common, or perhaps the dry part of the bed of a broad river, for the better display of articles of sale. Here may be seen, exhibited at the same time, the silks of China and the broad cloth of Europe, the dried fruits and other productions of Cashmeer and Persia, and the several manufactures of India. Here, as in England, may be seen also, all sorts of amusements calculated to please youth, as well as toys of every description, from the squeaking penny trumpet, the tinsel sword and gun, down to dolls and kings and queens, displayed in gorgeous array in cakes, composed of sugar instead of gingerbread. At one place may be seen tigers and other wild beasts become domesticated, while the facetious and mischievous monkey, riding on a goat by way of a charger, is always present where fun is to be looked for. At another are jugglers, mountebanks, and stage-players in all directions, with puppet-shows, and the attractive ups-and-downs and round-abouts, at a halfpenny for twenty turns, filled with giggling girls and awkward clowns, at one moment laughing wildly, at another screaming with affected apprehension as they ascend the air in their little swinging boxes. On the outskirts of the crowd are the markets for corn, cattle, sheep, and horses, and last, though not the least important branch of the ceremony, is the approach of the gigantic Hindoo car, thirty feet in height, with wheels of proportionate dimensions. Within this vehicle is seated the idol, the object of the anniversary, which is seen advancing slowly through the main street, covered with gold cloths and flowers, and drawn by several hundred persons, who think it an act of devotion to put a hand to the labour of dragging this luge moving temple. On these occasions decrepit old men or women, tired of life, voluntarily sacrifice themselves, by allowing the wheels to pass over them. The occurrence, however, is becoming more rare daily, and the march of intellect will, I have no doubt, in the course of time, tend altogether to do away the practice.

Col. Briggs has favoured us with his opinion on the subject of suttees; the following quotation is long, but we cannot exclude it:

In point of justice, I shall confine myself to the mere fact of its being an article of religious faith with the Hindoos, that the woman who shall burn on the same funeral pile with her husband absolves him from sin, and in a future state (as a reward for her fidelity and attachment) is indissolubly united to him. Faith is not a matter of choice, it is the result of conviction; though this conviction is certainly frequently effected through the efforts of the mind to believe doctrines taught us by persons whom we resnect. Any person who has witnessed the self-immolation of several Hindoo widows, conducting themselves as I have seen them, would find it difficult to divest himself of the idea that the very highest degree of faith had been attained by those infatuated females. The justice therefore of depriving them of their only religious consolation in the depth of grief (however mistaken their belief) seems at least doubtful. Moreover, I am of opinion that any general interference of the Legislature to abolish the practice would be imminently hazardous to our Indian empire. I am not afraid that insurrections would break out on every spot where prevention was adopted, though much would depend in the way it was conducted. But the danger to be apprehended is much deeper seated. It seems to me likely that more numerous victims would come forward, merely on account of the prohibition; the ceremonies would commence under due preparation for resisting the authority of government, and the military power would perhaps be called in to its support. Let us contemplate what would be the result in such a case. Public opinion would operate strongly against our departure from that principle which has hitherto restrained as from prohibiting the exercise of religious ceremonies; the general feelings would probably influence our native soldiers, and they might refuse to perform a duty which deprived their countrymen of those privileges hitherto held sacred. Let it not be supposed that at such a period the employment of our European troops would either save the dignity or preserve the safety of the government. England never can afford to dispense with her native army; and as to the idea of the latter being kept under subjection by the former, no one who reflects for a moment, or who has had any experience, would suggest it. The high spirit which inspires our native soldiery in the field would support it against even imaginary oppression, and the fearful odds of 230,000 regular troops, aided by a population of 100,000,000 of inhabitants, against 25,000 Europeans, must render all hope of successful opposition futile.

Having made these observations on the practicability, the policy, and the justice of the measure of prohibition, I will just say a few words on the possibility of preventing the ceremony by persuasion. We have heard it vaunted that Mr. Duncan at Benarcs, and that Colonel Walker in Kattywar, succeeded in dissuading the Rajkoomar and Jarejah Raj-poots from putting their female infants to death. The measure was most laudable, and I conceive it to be the only rational mode of effecting its abolition. From what I can learn, however, it is very doubtful if the success has been equal to the expectation formed, and I have heard it asserted even that female infanticide exists among the Rajkoomars of Juanpoor in as great a degree as ever.

It will readily be admitted that both these horrid rites are nearly equally repugnant to mankind, but we do not appreciate the Indian character, when we talk of abolishing teligious customs at once by coercive legislative acts. Our only hope is the distant but sure prospect we have of effacing superstition and prejudice, by the slow and solemn march of intelligence. Instruction has commenced her work, and the effects are already perceptible at all the presidencies; the reverence paid to idols and sacred ceremonies is daily decreasing, and having lost all veneration for them, the abolition of unmeaning and cruel rites will assuredly follow, and gradually prepare the people to receive the doctrines of a creed which inculcates the purest morality, and is founded on a basis neither open to attack on account of its maxims, or liable to censure in its practice. This prospect, therefore, though remote, is open to us. It is however by no means impossible that the endeavours of some humane European magistrate or political agent, might be successful in dissuading the inhabitants of a particular district, over which his local influence prevailed, to abandon the practice I have been discussing, and I will go so far as to admit it might be possible to persuade some Hindoo princes to enter into our feelings, and to interest themselves so far as to prevent the self-immolation of widows within their territory. The example might spread, and the infatuation gradually cease. But success, though possible in this case, is by no means certain; its progress would be slow, and unless the abolition proceeded from the fullest conviction of the inutility of propitiating the deity by such a sacrifice, there would be danger of the measure being at some time or other revived.

The last five letters are devoted to subjects of considerable importance, namely, village administration, connected with agriculture, &c.; the different revenue systems; police; punchayets, and general intercourse with the natives. Upon all these topics Col. Briggs has given lucid information, which has expressed in plain and perspicuous language. More may be learned upon these subjects from this little book than from some ponderous volumes we could mention.

Lettre de Tutundju-Oglou-Moustafa-Aga, véritable philosophe Turk, à M. Thaddée Bulgarin, Rédacteur de l'Abeille du Nord; traduite du Russe, et publiée, avec un savant Commentaire, par Koutlouk-Fouladi, ci-devant Ambassadeur de la Cour de Boukhara à Khiva (l'ancienne Germania), actuellement marchand d'abricots confits de Samarcande, et Littérateur. St. Petersburgh, 1828. 8vo. pp. 75.

A jeu d'esprit, at once humorous and severe. It is a keen satire upon the pretensions of M. Von Hammer, the well-known orientalist of Vienna, whom it accuses of incapacity for the task of translating from Eastern tongues. The writer of the letter is supposed to be a native of Jaffa, and his commentator a subject of Meer Hyder, the late khan of Bokhara, and once his ambassador to Khiva, though now a vendor of preserved apricots.

The real author has burlesqued the oriental epistolary style with great success. The introductory part of his letter to the "Editor Effendi" of the Abeille du Nord, consists of a detailed account of the circumstances of his family, and his accidental location at St. Petersburgh. In stating the simple facts of his story, we must, for brevity's sake, divest the narrative of its most amusing character.

The "Turkish philosopher" and his family for many generations were natives of Jaffa, where, ever since the introduction of tobacco, they had trafficked in that article, and in the pipes for smoking it: their shop was the most celebrated in all Syria. The father of Tutundju-Oglou and his next-door neighbour, a noted barber, were the first philosophers of Jaffa, and kept up a philosophical intercourse with the eunuchs of the Kislar Aga, many of the Janisaries, and others blessed with a taste for the sciences. Our letter-writer's father was fond of books, and made his son copy a multitude of manuscripts, whence he became a proficient in all the learning of the pachalic, and was complimented with the title of "zenith of the profound knowledge of the tail of the great she-bear of the belles-lettres." In these delectable pursuits, and in the tranquil enjoyment of the kaif, these tobacco-pipe-merchants passed a calm and pleasurable existence. It was, however, too delightful to last: the governor of the province of St. Jean d'Acre, the most faithful subject of the Porte, the most just, most liberal, most generous, most merciful, the flower of governors and the inexhaustible mine of virtue, Abdallah Pacha, who twice revolted against his prince, and who, for the good of their souls, hung a vast number of rich but miserly Arab traders, and confiscated their property for his own use, because they set apart too little for charity; this pious Pacha, becoming a merchant himself, buying and disposing of commodities at his own prices, happened one year to have no demand for his cotton and silk on the part of the Franks. He therefore ordered the Bedouins to collect alkali on the desert, wherewith he caused to be manufactured an enormous quantity of soap, which he distributed amongst the rich inhabitants of the province, with directions to pay the price set upon it by himself immediately into his treasury. The quantity of this useful article which was assigned to our philosopher's father was 14,000 rattles, enough to lather all Asia as well as Africa. The pipe-merchant made some remonstrances to the Pacha; whereupon his Equity gave orders that he should be strangled, and his goods seized, excepting the 14,000 rattles of soap, which devolved as inheritance upon his heir.

became

Our young philosopher murmured not at this event, seeing that it must have been predestined from before the creation of the world; but considering that it was impossible to dispose of all this soap in the pachalic, he determined to travel into Frankistan, in order that he might inflict a portion of it upon the Franks, as a punishment for not buying his Equity's silk and cotton, which had been the original cause of his misfortunes. After various adventures, he took up his abode at a shop in the Gostinoi Dvor, the grand bazar of St. Petersburgh.

Going one day to a printing office, in order to purchase some waste paper, in which to wrap up his genuine Jaffa soap, he received a mass of printed sheets, upon which, to his great joy, he discovered Arabic, Persian, and Turkish characters, together with French and other European tongues, a smattering of which he had acquired. He took these sheets home to his shop, and found them to be a learned work, entitled Sur les Origines Russes, extraits de Manuscripts Orientaux, par M. J. de Hammer, St. Petersbourg, 1627.

Upon slightly looking through the work, he says, he conceived that it was a continuation of the Arabian Nights, and he invited his neighbours to come and listen to the tales, which he proposed to translate verbally. Upon more attentive examination, however, he was mortified to find that it was an historical work: historical tales, he remarks, are far less amusing than others.

And can you guess, my dear Editor Effendi, what is intended to be shewn in this history which I bought to wrap round my Jaffa soap? The most honourable, most learned, most profound, most fertile M. de Hammer, cream of the ulemas of Vienna, and ornament of Nanicheh writers, wishes to convince the world that our prophet makes mention of the Russians in the Coran; that he has discovered proofs in oriental writers that the Russians formerly inhabited Great Bucharia, and that the Coscase of the Don that the Russians formerly inhabited Great Bucharia, and that the Coscase of the Don texted in the tenth century! And upon what, think you, does M. de Hammer build existed in the tenth century! Upon a verse in the Coran which refers to certain Asshabthese curious conjectures? Upon a verse in the Coran which refers to certain Asshab-aran-Ras, or the people of Ras. But no one had ever before imagined that Asshab-aran-Ras could refer to the Russians, who, whilst our good prophet was rightly prohibiting his disciples from drinking the bad wine of the Hedjaz, quaffed at their ease, in total ignorance of him, the excellent beer of Scandinavia. Ebn Kathir, one of our theologians, has written a long chapter upon this passage of the Coran, in which, I confess, I cannot discover a grain of common sense. My late father had abundant reason to dislike imams, with their tedious verbiage, and to refuse to let them have tobacco without the money down; for, truly, all that Ebn Kathir, in his parade of frivolous erudition, has written upon the meaning of the phrase Asshab-ar-Ras is not worth ten drachms of Latakia tobacco. Yet M. de Hammer, who quotes this whole chapter of Ebn Kathir, has printed the Arabic text with a sort of a French translation; and he attaches as much importance to, and seems to believe as firmly in, all the pious reveries of this superstitious doctor, as if he had been promised for it a place in the paradise of Mahomet.

The Turkish marchand-philosophe then proceeds to criticise the translations of M. Von Hammer from the oriental tongues; and it must be confessed that he has established some proofs of gross negligence, if not of ignorance. It would be inconvenient to detail the various instances alleged in this "letter;" we shall select one or two as examples of the rest.

In the first place, the letter-writer has shewn by various instances that M. Von Hammer has misunderstood participles, and mere parts of speech, for proper names, and has consequently called into existence nations which have only a "grammatical origin."

Of such nations you will find so large a number in M. de Hammer's book, that you may make of them an empire more powerful than that of Austria. Have you ever heard of such nations as these: the Tamlessans, the Anjars, the Shefnans, the Burhaz, the Esroussiyas, the Sasfers, the Saskars, the Ashans, the Gharams, the Kholekhs, the Muharikas, the Birkets, &c.? All these people derive their birth from the pen of the learned M. de Hammer, in exactly the same manner as the respectable Ikhtiars ( ) which significes free-will, opinion, M. Von Hammer makes a proper name), and the brave gerundive nation of the Munfeshas ( cxample the country of Birket (or "the basin"): I will lay you a wager that you will not guess in a thousand trials what country it is, although it is well known to you. It is Russia, my dear Editor Effendi! This is the way in which M. de Hammer translates a passage from the geography of Abulfeda: "Okek is the boundary of the camp of the king of the Tartars of the country of Birket, which does not extend further." Yet his majesty the king of Hama has condescended to say, in a manner perfectly intelligible to those who know his language: "the encampments of the great horde of the Tartar sovereign of the empire of Bergueh-khan extend as far as Oukek, but they do not go beyond that point." I need not renind you that Bergueh was one of the successors of the famous Batu, the conqueror of Russia; hut M. de Hammer has confounded the name of this Mongol khan with the Arabic word bicket, which signifies lake, pool, or basin, of which he has made his wonderful "country of Birket."

M. Von Hammer, it appears, has erected his hypothesis as to the Asiatic origin of the Russian nation upon a passage in Masoudi. Our philosopher gives M. Von Hammer's translation, and compares it with his own, "made according to the manner in which the Arabic tongue and eastern geography are understood at Jaffia." Certainly the discrepancy is not a little astonishing. The term in Masoudi, which M. de Hammer considers to mean Russians, is plainly shewn to signify no such thing; and the Turkish philosopher maintains that such a critic and such a geographer as M. de Hammer might deduce the origin of the Russians from the moon.

This lively and caustic letter concludes in the following serious manner:

But I have written too much already, dear Editor Effendi, about a work which at Jaffa Jaffa will infallibly be treated as it deserves. I shall think I have fulfilled my object if my observations shall inspire you and your readers with a proper distrust of the translations which the learned Austrian orientalist pretends to make of Arabic, Persian, and Turkish texts, and with which he is continually inundating the literature of several European nations. Such rhapsodies ought to excite the indignation of every lover of science, because they embarrass the progress of oriental studies, upon which they throw an unfavourable light, by making people believe that the writings of the best authors are tissues of absurdities and nonsense; and because they, moreover, propagate errors, by imposing upon the good-nature of your laborious compilers, who adopt without suspicion these wretched versions, and the false data which result therefrom, and incorporate them in their works. To make the literary world acquainted with the intrinse value of this sort of materials, which it is incessantly loaded with, under titles at once pompous and mysterious, is, in my opinion, to render a service to science.

We may add, that the original text of most of the passages referred to in M. Von Hammer's work is appended to this letter; so that the oriental critic has the means of judging for himself.

Antiquitatis Graca et Romana Loca quadam e Rossorum lingua et uribus illustrata; auctore Frederico Grefo. Partic. I. Petropol, 1825. 4to pp. 48.

This very crudite disquisition is appended to a list of the lectiones publicæ in the Imperial University of St. Petersburgh, printed in the Russian and Latin languages. It is an attempt to elucidate Greek and Roman authors by reference to Russian customs and manners. The attempt is by no means a futile one; it is by no means improbable, considering the connection of Russia in former times with the Greek empire, that many peculiarities of the classic ages may have been retained there.

The first experiment made by Mr. Græse is upon Homer, in an endeavour to explain two passages which refer to marked lots, sortes signo notatæ, and which he considers to have been hitherto ill understood. We must confine ourselves to a very compendious analysis of this example of Mr. Græse's ingenuity.

The two passages in question are II.  $\zeta$ . 168, and II.  $\pi$ . 175, in both of which lots are spoken of marked with signs. These passages, particularly the latter, he is of opinion may be so clearly illustrated by the Russian mode, of casting lots, that every obscurity will vanish. Hector (in the last instance) having challenged any Greek to single combat, Menclaus determined to meet him, but is dissuaded by Agamemnon. Nestor having reproached the chiefs for their backwardness, nine of the boldest came forward, and Nestor proposes the lot to decide who should be the champion. Then follows the passage in question:

-Oi δὶ ΚΔΗΡΟΝ ἘΣΗΜΗ NANTO ἔκαττος,

ΈΝ δ'"ΕΒΛΛΟΝ ΚΥΝΕΉ 'Λγαμέμνονος 'Ατζείδαο.

After offering prayers, the narrative continues:

- Πάλλεν δὶ Γερήνιος ίππότα Νεστως.

Έχ δ'Ελορε χλήξος χυνέης, ον ἄρ' ήθελον αὐτοὶ,
Αἴαντος κήσυξ δὶ Φέρων ἀν' όμιλον ἀπάντη,
Διῖξ' ἐνδίξια πᾶσιν ἀριστήεσσιν 'Αχαιών'
Οι δ'ου' γιγνώσκοντες, ἀπηνήναντο έκαστος'
'Αλλ' ότε δὴ τὸν έκανε, Φέρων ἀν' όμιλον ἀπάντη,
"Ος μιν 'ΕΠΙΓΡΑ' ΨΑΣ κυνέη βάλε Φαιδιμος Αἴας,

<sup>7</sup>Ητοι ὑπέσχιθε χεῖρ ὁ δ'ἀρ εμβαλεν ἄγχι παραστάς. Γνῶ δὲ ΚΛΗ 'POΥ ΣΗ ΜΛ ίδὰν, γ/βησε δὲ θυμῷ. Τὸι μὲν πὰρ πόδ' ἐὸν χαμαδις βάλε.—ν. 151, et sca.

It thus appears that the articles used for lots were marked by each person, and east into the helmet, which was shaken by Nestor till one fell out; the herald took it from the ground and showed it to the chiefs around, beginning at the right till he came to the individual who had marked the lot, who was Ajax; when he had recognized his own lot, he rejoiced, and then threw the lot away as a thing of no further use: the latter circumstance shows, Mr. Græfe remarks, that the  $\lambda \lambda \tilde{g}_{pos}$  was a thing of no intrinsic value.

After quoting several passages from the Roman authors, wherein a corresponding description is given of the lot, Mr. Græfe details the method of lot amongst the Russians, when a postilion is wanted and many offer. They take each a small piece of coin from their pouch, and mark it with their nail or teeth, so that they may know it again. A Nestor in sheep-skin then holds a cap instead of a helmet; the copper lots are then thrown in; the cap is shaken in the presence of all, and out leaps the lot that determines your postilion. There being no herald, the lot passes from hand to hand till it reaches the person who put it in the cap. There is this difference in the two cases; whereas the Greeks threw their lots away when the question was decided, the Russians, on the contrary, put their lots into their pouches again.

The reader may, if he pleases, believe the author of this learned treatise to be perfectly serious.

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS.

Popular Lectures on the Steam Engine. By the Rev. Dionysius Lardner, LL D., &c. London, 1828. 12mo. pp. 164.

Since the application of that astonishing mechanical agent, steam, to the arts, manufactures, and navigation of this country, has become extensive, a variety of works have appeared on the subject of the steam engine. There is something extremely interesting in the history of its perfection; and the various inventions which the ingenuity of man contrived to correct the defects of its original plan, may be detailed by different writers without becoming tiresome. "The history of the steam engine," says Dr. Lardner, "presents a series of contrivances, which, for exquisite and refined ingenuity, stand without a parallel in the annals of human invention. These admirable contrivances, unlike the results of scientific investigation, have also this peculiarity, that to understand and appreciate their excellence, requires no previous or subsidiary knowledge. A simple and clear explanation, divested as far as possible of technicalities, and assisted by well-selected diagrams, is all that is necessary to render the principles of the construction and operation of the steam engine intelligible to a person of plain understanding and moderate information."

These lectures are adapted for this end; they have undergone the test of public approbation on their delivery; and we doubt not that their merit will secure them a further portion of it in their present form.

Life of Robert Burns. By J. G. Lockhart, I.L.B. (Constable's Miscellany, vol. xxiii.) Edinburgh, 1828. 12mo. pp. 310.

It must have been from a conviction that the biography of Burns possessed no common charm, that Mr. Lockhart undertook a task which has been performed by so many others. Every incident in the life of that extraordinary man, it might have been expected, had been told and retold by his previous biographers. Mr. Lockhart, however, has given us a delightful little volume, which we are persuaded will be a favourite as long as the poetry of Burns shall continue to please, and even its author cannot desire for it a longer existence. The earlier parts of the history are chiefly compiled from preceding writers; the incidents of his closing years have been more copiously detailed in this volume, from respectable authorities. Sir Walter Scott has given a very pleasing account of his interview with Burns in 1786, and of the impression which his appearance produced upon him, whilst Sir Walter was a lad of fifteen.

Two of the still surviving sons of Robert Burns are in the East-India Company's service: William Nicol Burns, the poet's third son, is now a deputy-assistant commissary-general of the Madras army; the youngest son, James Glencairn Burns, is assistant commissary-general in the army of Bengal.

The British Gunner. By Capt. J. Morton Spearman, H.P. unattached. London, 1828. Sm. 8vo. pp. 448.

This is a neat pocket encyclopædia of the art or science of gunnery, treating succinctly, but clearly and intelligibly, of every subject connected with that department of the art military, arranged alphabetically. The author has a sort of hereditary claim to this path of learning; the "Pocket Gunner," a work which has passed through eight editions, having been originally compiled chiefly from contributions by his father. The last edition of that work, which has recently appeared, Capt. Spearman considers to be defective: "whilst much obsolete matter was retained, many of the improved ments, to which the advanced state of the service had led, were entirely omitted." He, therefore, readily adopted the suggestions of his friends to compile an improved work. Of this work we must let Capt, Spearman speak:

"I have thought it very desirable that a work of this kind should contain not only the practice of artillery and engineering, as was the case with the 'Bombardier and Pocket Gunner,' but also some elucidation of the theory of those sciences; and I have therefore introduced several scientific papers on these subjects. Besides, undertaking to correct the errors of obsolete rules, and to enlarge and extend the quantity of useful information with which such a book should assist the practice of the professed artilleris', I have farther endeavoured to make the present volume of some worth, on other points, to individuals in the lower ranks of the artillery, as well as to the junior members of the service in general."

Essays, &c. By Frederic De George. London, 1827. 8vo. pp. 90.

This is a collection of papers which have appeared in several periodical works, French and English; they were republished in their present form, we are told by the author, in order to recommend his pretensions to the professorship of French literature in the London University. Some of them are written in French, the native language of the author; the majority in English; and it is but justice to say that in the latter M. De George has displayed a skill which could scarcely be expected from a foreigner. We subjoin a short specimen; it is the concluding paragraph of a paper entitled "A Sketch of the French Revolution:"—

"A free government is a fruitful garden, whose exuberant fertility may be occasionally encumbered with noxious weeds; the most brilliant, the most prosperous despotism is but a stately tree, whose far-spread boughs intercept the dews of heaven, whose deep-fixed roots drain the moisture of the soil, and whose baneful luxuriance is fatal to every plant of humbler growth which comes within the withering influence of its shade."

All the pieces in this collection exhibit marks of an excellent taste and a well culti-

Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland.

Saturday, May 3d, 1838.—The general meeting of the Society was held this day, at 2 o'clock P.M.; Sir George Thomas Staunton, Bart., V.P., in the chair.

Amongst the donations presented were the following, viz.:-

From Sir A. Johnston, V.P.R.A.S., a Candyan musket, which had belonged to the King of Candy; the portrait of a Rajput, painted on wood; Dr. Scott's Latin Dissertation upon the Native Medicinal Plants of Ceylon; Vassali's Maltese Grammar; two reports of cases of appeal from the East-Indies; a MS. account of Ceylon, Dutch and English; the translation of a Malabar book. From J. C. C. Sutherland, Esq., of Calcutta, three Burmese MSS. From Professor Seyffarth, a defence of his hieroglyphical system. From M. Klaproth, a critique on Dr. Schott's edition of the works of Confucius. From the Yorkshire Philosophical Society, its Annual Report for 1827.

John Rutherford, Esq. was elected a resident member of the Society.

The chairman announced that the council had resolved to recommend the Raja of Satara to the meeting this day for election as an honorary member, in consequence of the sentiments manifested by his Highness in relation to literature, expressed in an extract, which was read by the chairman, from the address presented by the Raja of Satara and other native princes to the Hon. M. Elphinstone, upon the occasion of his retiring from the government of Bombay.* The meeting having, conformably to the twelfth article of the regulations, proceeded to an immediate ballot, his Highness the Raja of Satara was unanimously elected an honorary member of the Society.

Lieutenant Colonel Briggs then commenced the reading of his Memoir of the Secret Transactions at the Court of the Peshwa, Madhoo Rao the Great, between 1761 and 1772, drawn from original letters which passed between the Peshwa and his minister, Nana Furnevees, and now in the possession of Colonel Briggs.

For a detailed history of the public transactions during the period at which these letters were written, Colonel Briggs refers to Captain Grant Duff's excellent History of the Mahrattas, and gives in this paper merely a brief narrative of these events for the purpose of elucidating and connecting the epistles, which, as translated by him, compose the substance of his present communication.

The Mahommedans first approached the Nilāb in the tenth century; and three centuries elapsed before they penetrated to the south bank of the Nerbudda. At the period of the invasion of the Emperor Baber, in 1526, all India north of the Kistna had been conquered by the Moslems, and thirteen independent Mahommedan sovereigns reigned over fifty millions of Hindus. But as every succeeding Mogul emperor seemed to esteem it a personal duty to attempt the reduction of these separate powers beneath their single sway, at the time when Aurangzebe filled the throne of Dehli, this object was accomplished, and that emperor reigned in undivided sovereignty. About this time, however, Shabjee, a Hindu officer of the kingdom of Bejapoor, commenced the scheme of making conquests, nominally for his sovereign, but really reserving the government of them in his own hands. This plan was successfully followed up by his son Sivajee, who founded the kingdom of Satara, in the Deccan. His grandson, Shao, yielded himself up to the enjoyment of luxury and pleasure, and his power was usurped by his prime minister, entitled the Peshwa, who held his vice-regal court at Poona. Balajee was the first who enjoyed this dignity; his son, Bajee Rao was the second. Balajee the second, father of Madhoo Rao the Great, succeeded Bajee Rao in 1740. Colonel Briggs here gives a sketch of the rise and progress of the Mahratta power, and of its relations with the neighbouring states, till the fatal battle of Paniput, at which the Peshwa's eldest and favourite son, Wiswas Rao, and also his cousin, Sudashew Rao, are both supposed to have fallen. Nana Furnevees was present at this action, as mentioned in his autobiography, of which Colonel Briggs read a translation before the Society at a late meeting. The Peshwa himself did not long survive this catastrophe; he died at Poona, leaving two sons, Madhoo Rao, aged sixteen, who succeeded to the dignity of Peshwa, and Narrain Rao, aged nine years. The young Peshwa's paternal uncle, Ragonaut Rao (better known to Europeans by the name of Ragoba), retained all the power in his own hands. Madhoo Rao accompanied his maternal uncle, Trimbuck Rao, upon a campaign into Mysore, for the purpose of levying tribute: and from the suggestions he received from Trimbuck Rao, as well as from the wishes of his mother, he was induced, upon his return to Poona, to insist upon being allowed to exercise his rights of sovereignty, or at least to share it with his uncle Ragoba. Upon this, the latter with his adherents, thinking that the Peshwa would be unable to form a ministry without them, resigned and retired from Poona. Madhoo Rao, however, immediately formed a new administration, at the head of which was placed his maternal uncle, Trimbuck Rao, and in which his bosom friend, Nana, filled the place of Furnevees, or record-keeper. Ragoba now meditated an alliance with the Nizam, Ali Khan; and in order to prevent an occurrence so dangerous to the interests of the Mahratta empire, the young Peshwa resigned the government into his uncle's hands. The Nizam, being thus disappointed in his views upon the Mahratta territory, by means of an alliance with Ragoba, nevertheless invaded it, but retired upon hearing that a force was collecting to oppose him. Ragoba, at the head of an army, and accompanied by his nephew the Peshwa, overtook the Nizam as he was retreating across the Godavery. Part of the Mahomedan army had already crossed, and Ragoba immediately attacked the remainder: His force was repulsed, and he himself was taken prisoner: when his gallant nephew, notwithstanding the wrongs he had sustained from Ragoba, determined upon relieving him from his perilous condition, and calling upon his personal guard of 100 men to follow him, not only rescued his uncle, but completely changed the fortunes of the day. A translation of a letter written by the Peshwa to Nana Furnevees is here given, containing the account of the events of this day; in which, however, all mention of his own bravery is avoided. The heroic conduct of the young Peshwa led to a partial reconciliation between him and his uncle; and an arrangement was made, by which the Peshwa was at liberty to proceed to the south for the purpose of resuming the campaign against Mysore, while his uncle was to be left in charge of the government at Poona. Ragoba, however, still entertained the idea of seizing the person of his nephew, an intention of which the latter was informed when at a short distance from the capital. The Peshwa immediately directed his troops to return by the high road to Poona, while he himself, accompanied by only one attendant, crossed the country, and arrived early the next morning at the palace of Ragoba, whose astonishment at the sudden appearance of his nephew was boundless. He was quite disarmed by the generous and open conduct of his nephew, and the arrival of the troops of the latter soon afterwards enabled him more easily to make arrangements for the conduct of government during his absence. Suheram Bapoo, who had been Ragoba's chief adviser, the Peshwa insisted should accompany the army; thus securing his separation from Ragoba and the advantage of his talents to himself. He left his mother and brother at the capital; while to Nana Furuevees was entrusted the management of affairs. Ragoba and his wife retired to their palace on the Godavery near Nassuck.

The continuation of this interesting paper was reserved for a future occasion; and the thanks of the meeting were voted to Colonel Briggs for this portion of it.

May 17th.—The general meeting of the Society held this day was made special, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of holding the general meetings of the Society on every Saturday, instead of on the first and third Saturdays in the month, as at present. The Right Honourable C. W. Williams Wynn, president, took the chair.

The President, in putting the resolution to the vote, stated as the reason for its being brought forward, that the Society was in possession of many valuable communications, which it would be impossible to lay before the meetings under the present arrangement, there being only two meetings remaining in the present session, exclusive of the present; and he observed that the proposed plan might be tried as a temporary expedient during the remainder of this session, and its future adoption or rejection would depend upon its effects with regard to the convenience of members. The motion being put from the chair and seconded, was then balloted for, and unanimously agreed to. The general meetings of the Society will consequently be held on every Saturday to the end of June, at the usual hour, 2 o'clock.

Amongst the donations reported at this meeting were the following:-

Sir G. T. Staunton, Bart., V.P., presented the Transactions of the Imperial Academy at St. Petersburg, 14 vols. 4to. Bailly's Works on Astronomy, 5 vols. 4to. His own Translation of the Penal Code of China, and Richardson's Persian and Arabic Detionary, 2 vols. fol. Sir A. Johnston, V.P., presented a collection of East-India official papers. From Professor Berggren, was presented part of his Abridged French and Arabic Dictionary. From Sir W. Bethau, his Irish Antiquarian Researches.

Thomas Hanson Peile, Esq., and John Christian Huttner, Esq., were elected resident members of the Society.

Professor Habicht, of Breslaw; the Rev. John Humbert, of Geneva; and Major Elont, the Netherlands resident at Rhio, were elected foreign members of the Society.

Captain James Low, of Penang, and Baboo Radhacant Deb, of Calcutta, were elected corresponding members of the Society.

The President laid before the meeting a communication which he had received from Sir John Malcolm, Governor of Bombay, being the report of a special meeting of the Literary Society of that presidency, held on the 5th of December 1827, at which Sir John, as president of that Society, brought forward the views of the Royal Asiatic Society with respect to a closer union of the two societies.* The secretary having read this communication, it was moved by Sir Alex. Johnston, and resolved unanimously, that the special thanks of the Society be given to Sir John Malcolm, for the prompt and zealous manner in which he had executed the wishes of this Society. Sir Alexander Alexander further stated that a letter had been received from Sir John Malcolm, in which it was announced, that in order to mark the Society's respect for Abbas Mirza, the Prince Royal of Persia, his Royal Highness's diploma of election, as an honorary member of the Society, had been forwarded to Persia in charge of an officer.

Mr. Richard Clarke then read two letters which he had received from Ram Raz, a learned native of Madras, and head English master of the College of Fort St. George. These communications had reference to an essay on Hindu architecture, which Ram Raz is now preparing for this Society.

The thanks of the Society were given to Mr. Clarke for this communication: and the meeting adjourned to Saturday, the 24th inst.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PROLAND.

Statement relative to Serampore, by J. Marshman, D.D. With Introductory Observations, by John Foster. 3s.

The Adventures of Hajie Buba, of Ispahan, in England. 2 vols. post 8vo. 15s.

Researches in South Africa; illustrating the Cl-vil, Moral, and Religious Condition of the Na-tive Tribes; including Journals of the Author's Travels in the Interior. By the Rev. John Philip, D.D., Superintendent of the Missions of the Lou-don Missionary Society at the Cape of Good Hope, &c. 2 vols. 8vo., with Engravings. 21s.

Asiatic Costumes; containing Forty coloured Plates. 12mo. 18s.

Fishes of (eylon: a Selection of the most remarkable and interesting of the Fishes found on the Coasts of (eylon, from Drawings made in the Southern Parts of that Island from the Living Specimens. By J. W. Bennett, Esq., F.H.S., and Member of the Literary and Agnenitural Society of Leylon, Ac. No. I., in royal 4to, price C1 1s. (To be comprised in Six Numbers, and to be continued Monthly until finished.) tinued Monthly until finished.)

Part II. of India; or Facts submitted to illustrate the Character and Condition of the Native Inhabitants, &c. &c. By R. Rickards, Esq. 8vo.

The East-India Register and Directory, corrected to 13th May 1829. Compiled by A. W. Mason, Geo. Owen, and G. H. Brown, of the Secretary's Office, East-India House. 10s.

Instructions on French Pronunciation and on the Geuders, in the Form of a French Vocabulary and Reader. By Marin de la Voye, of the East India Company's Military Seminary.

Journal of a Residence in the Sandowsh Islands, during the Vears 1823, 24, and 25, including Remarks on the Manners and Customs of the Inhabitants; an Account of Lord Byron's Visit in 11.M.s. Blunde; and a Description of the Ceremonies observed at the Interment of the late King and Queen in the Island of Oahu. By C. S. Stewart, late American Missionary at the Sandwich Islands. With an Introduction and occasional Notes by Wm. Ellis. 12mo. 88. Wm. Ellis. 12mo. 84.

The Harp of Judah; a Selection of Poems relative to the Conversion of the Jews, &c. 3s. 6d.

The Missionary Gazetteer. By the Rev. C. Williams. 12mo. 8s.

In the Press.

The Annals of Ragas'than, or Rajpootana, the Country of the Ancient Rajpoot Tribes of Western India. By Lieut. Col. Jas. Tod, M.R.A.S. I 2 vols. 4to, illustrated by an Original Map, Engravings, Fac-Similies, &c. &c.

Buddhuim: illustrated from original Manuscripts of its Doctrine, Metaphysics, and Philosophy: accompaned by Forty-three Engravings, lithographed from the Cingalese Originals, deuton-strative of their Scheme of the Universe, and the Personal Attributes of the Buddhoo; also Notices Personal Actioners in the Journal of also Notices of the Planetary or Ball Incantations and the De-mon Worship still existing in that Island. By Ed-ward Upham, Member of the Royal Aslatic So-ciety of Great Britain and Ireland, F.S.A. In one vol Imperial 4to.

BENGAL.

A History of the Boondelas. By Capt. W. R. Pogson, of the Bengal Army. 28 Rs.—(This work contains a Map of Bundlekhund and Ten Lithographic Views of various Forts, &c. in Bundlekhund.)

The Indigo Planter's Manual, or Guide to Put-Compiled and arranged by Ezckiel Mushica, broker. 12 Rs. (To be continued annually.)

A Dictionary in Bengalee and English. By Tarrachund Chukruburtee. 8vo.

First Love, a Poem; with Minor Pieces. By William Masters.

THE CONTINENT.

Dr. Wilhelm's Schott's Vorgebliche Übersetzung der Werke des Confacus aus der Ursprache, Eine Latterarische Betrugeri; 'dargestellt von Wilhelm Lauterbach. Leipsic, 8vo.

Lettre de Tutundyu-Oglou-Moustafa-Aga, vérl-table philosophe Turk, à M. Thaddée Bulgarin, &c. St. Petersburg, 8vo.

De Priser Akgyption un Litteraturi. By Professor Kosegarten. Weinnar, 4to. Windtgung und Abfertgung der Klaprothschen sogennanten Beleuchtung und Widerlegung seiner Forschungen im Gebleit der Geschichte der Völker Mittel-Asiens. By I. J. Schmidt. Leipsic, 8vo.

muter-ascus. 19 1.3 Scinillat. Letjiste, 890.
Glos d'un Jeune Gree, sulvies de six chants de guerre écrits en vers Grees, et traduits en prose Française par le même auteur. (Panago Sonitzo).
Paris, 890. "J'ai composé ces poéses dans les cafés d'Égline, sur les rivages de Salaumie, dans les champs ensanglantés de Marathon."—Pref.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

SILK TRADE.

(Ordered to be printed, 17th April 1828.)

An Account shewing the Quantity of Raw Silk sold at the East-India Company's Sales, in each of the last Five Years ending 5th January 1828; distinguishing the quantity actually sold, the average Sale Price, and the Stock remaining in Warehouse unsold, after each Sale.

| Sales.        | Quant  | Average SalePrice per lb. |    | Quantity remaining in Warehouse Unsold after each Sale. |         |
|---------------|--------|-------------------------------|----|---------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| Ĭ             | Bales. | Lbs.                          |    | đ.                                                      | Bales.  |
| 2d S.S. 1822  | 2,024  | 284,162                       | 19 | 1                                                       | 4,581   |
| 1st M.S. 1823 | 2,281  | 310,936                       | 16 | 9                                                       | 6,974   |
| 2d M.S. 1823  | 2,109  | 289,619                       | 16 | 1                                                       | 9,508   |
| 1st S.S. 1823 | 1,750  | 249,217                       | 15 | 9                                                       | 8,792   |
| 2d S.S. 1823  | 3,220  | 429,314                       | 14 | 9                                                       | 6,034   |
| M.S. 1824     | 3,112  | 422,407                       | 15 | 1                                                       | 10,620  |
| 1st S.S. 1824 | 3,129  | 417,341                       | 18 | 1                                                       | • 7,409 |
| 2d S.S. 1824  | 2,751  | 388,226                       | 23 | 10                                                      | 5,002   |
| M.S. 1825     | 3,676  | 481,058                       | 17 | 8                                                       | 7,458   |
| 1st S.S. 1825 | 3,178  | 423,686                       | 16 | 7                                                       | 5,226   |
| 2d S S 1825   | 1,591  | 185,394                       | 14 | 8                                                       | 7,397   |
| M.S. 1826     | 2,286  | 291,284                       | 13 | 9                                                       | 13,518  |
| 1st S.S. 1826 | 4,823  | 648,055                       | 14 | 1                                                       | 8,856   |
| 2d S.S. 1826  | 4,369  | 588,414                       | 16 | 6                                                       | 4,426   |
| M.S. 1827     | 4,000  | 520,913                       | 16 | 9                                                       | 8,369   |
| 1st S.S. 1827 | 4,246  | 556,374                       | 17 | 3                                                       | 5,624   |

SUGAR AND COFFEE.

(Ordered to be printed, 17th April 1828.)

Sugar.—Account of the Quantities of East-India unrefined Sugar imported into Great Britain, and exported from thence, and the Amount of Duty received on East-India Sugar imported, in the year ending 5th January 1828.

| uty received.£. |
|---------------------|
| 229,281             |
| 171,777             |
| 401,058             |
| 1                   |

Coffee.—Account of the Quantities of East-India Coffee imported into Great Britain, and exported from thence, and the Amount of Duty received on East-India Coffee imported, in the Year ending 5th January 1828.

|                      | Imported.lbs. | Exported.lbs. | Duty received. $\pounds$ . |  |
|----------------------|-------------------|-------------------|----------------------------|--|
| Mauritius            | 279               |                   |                            |  |
| East-India and China | 5,872,102         | 4,655,104         | 33,201                     |  |
|                      | 5,872,381         | 4,655,104         | 33,201                     |  |
|                      | 0,012,301         | 4,000,104         | 5.3,201                    |  |

VARIETIES.

ORIENTAL TRANSLATION FUND,*

A meeting of the subscribers to the Oriental Translation Fund was held on the 7th May, at the house of the Royal Asiatic Society, in Grafton Street, Bond Street.

H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex was to have taken the chair: in his absence, through indisposition, H. R. H. Prince Leopold of Saxe-Cobourg presided.

There were present besides, Earl Spencer, the Earl of Cassilis, Viscount Melville, the Right Hon. C. W. W. Wynn, M.P., the Right Hon. Sir Gore Ouseley, Bart., Sir Edward Hyde East, Bart., M.P., Sir Edw. Kerrison, Bart., M.P., Admiral Sir C. Morice Pole, Bart., M. P., Admina on Condition of the M.P., Sir J. W. Waller, Bart., Sir Alexander Johnston, Knt., G. Watson Taylor, Esq., M.P., Licutt Col. Fitzclarence, Licut. Col. Wm. Blackburne, &c. &c.

Sir Gore Ouseley, as chairman of the Oriental Translation committee, read the prospectus explanatory of the objects of the subscribers and committee, the names of the patrons and subscribers, and lists of the committee as originally selected by the Royal Asiatic Society, and as subsequently enlarged by the addition of the most eminent British orientalists in various parts of the world.

He then read a report of the proceedings of the committee from the date of its nomination to the present time, accompanied by a list of the translations that have been offered to it for publica-

The following works have been accepted, and some of them are in a forward state of preparation for the press.

Class I. Theology, Ethics, and Ecclesiastical History.

1. The Curai, a work on Ethics. Written by iruvalluven. Translated by Richard Clarke, Tiruvailuven.

This ancient work, written in the purest style of Tanul poetry, possesses a very high reputation in the whole of Southern India.

2. The Annals of Elias, Metropolitan of Nisi-is. Translated by the Rev. Josiah Forshall, A.M. bis. Translated by the Rev. Josiah Forshau, A. at. This Syriac chronicle contains chronological tables of the principal dynastics of the world. brief memours of the patrlarche of the Nestorian church—and notices of the most remarkable events in the East, from the birth of our Saviour to the beginning of the eleventh century:

3. Akhlak e Naseri of Naser ud Din of Tus in incharia. Translated by the Rev. H. G. Keene, Bucharla.

A.M. This Persian system of Ethics is an elaborate composition, formed on Greek models, and is very highly esteemed in Persia.

4. A Collation of the Syriac MSS, of the New Testament, both Nestorian and Jacobite, that are accessible in England. By the Rev. Professor Lee.

* See a full account of this magnificent undertaking in our present volume, p. 183.

This collation will include the various readings of all the Syriac MSS of the New Testament in the British Museum, and the libraries at Oxford, Cambridge, &c.

Camorage, ec.
5. The Didacalla; or Apostolical Constitutions of the Abyssinian Church. Translated by T. P. Platt, Esq. A.M.
This ancient Ethiopic work is unknown in Europe, and contains many very curious opinions.

6. The Bustan of Sadi. Translated by James

This is a much-admired Persian poem, consist-ing of tales, &c. illustrative of moral duties.

Class II. History, Geography, and Travels.

7. The Tareki Afghan. Translated by Dr. Berns

This is a Persian history of the Afghaus, who claim to be descended from the Jews. It will be accompanied by an account of the Afghau tribes.

8. The Travels of Evila Effendi. Translated by Counsellor Von Hanmer. This work contains an account, in Turkish, of the travels of Evila in all parts of the Turkish empire, and in Turkestan, &c. in the early part of the seventeenth century.

9. Naima's Annals. Translated by the Rev. Dr. Handsroan.

9. Nature 3. Manuary 1. Henderson.

This Turkish history comprises the period between 1622 and 1622; and includes accounts of the Turkish invasion of Germany, the sieges of Buda, 10. Ibn Khaldun's History of the Berbers.

Translated by the Rev. Profesor Lec.
This race and valuable Arabic work contains an account of the origin, progress, and decline of the dynasties which governed the northern coast of Africa.

11. The great Geographical Work of Idrist, Translated by the Rev. G. C. Renouard, B.D. This Arabic work was written, A.D. 1163, to explain a large silver globe made for Roger, King of Socily; and is divided into the seven climates described by Ptolemy.

12. Makriss Kintat; or, History and Statistics of Egypt. Translated by Abaham Salame. This Arabit work includes accounts of the conquest of Egypt by the Caliphs, A.D. 640, of the cities, rivers, ancient and modern inhabitants of Egypt, &c.

13. Part of Mirkhond's Rozet ul Suffa. Translated by David Shea, Esq.
The part of this Persian work selected for publication is that which contains the history of Persia, from Kajomurs to the death of Alexander the Great.

Class III. Belles-Lettres.

14. Meher va Mushteri. Translated by Dr. Bernhard Dorn.

This is a popular Persian poem, which cele-brates the friendship and adventures of Meher and Mushteri, the sons of King Shapur and his grand vizier.

15. Hatim Tae. Translated by Duncan Forbes,

Esq. A.M.
This is a popular Persian romance, which narrates the seven perilous adventures of Hatim, an Arab chief.

16. Ferhad va Shirin. Translated by James

Mitchell, Esq.
This Persian poem contains the tale of Ferhad, a celebrated statuary, and Shirin, Princess of Persia. It also includes several curious legends relating to Adam, Mahommed, &c.

The report stated that the subscriptions amounted to £1,099 per annum.

Amongst the resolutions unanimously passed at this meeting was one of thanks to H. R. H. the Duke of Clarence, for the zealous and efficient manner in which his Royal Highness has promoted the establishment establishment of the Oriental Translation Fund: which was moved by Sir A. Johnston and seconded by Sir Gore Ouse-

In the speech with which he prefaced the motion, Sir Alexander entered somewhat fully into the nature and views of this institution. He observed that its importance resulted from the objects it has in view, the circumstances which attended its formation, the time at which it was formed, the persons who compose it, and the moral and political effect which it is directly calculated to produce in India and England.

Its object, he stated, was to afford the people and government of England an accurate knowledge of the religion, laws, and character of the people of Asia, and thereby better qualify us for governing our immense Indian empire.

The circumstances which attended its formation Sir Alexander represented as follows: "Dr. Lee, the professor of oriental languages at Cambridge, one of the most distinguished oriental scholars in Europe, wrote to me a letter from Cambridge about twelve months ago, requesting me to take such means as I might think proper for carrying into effect a plan which he submitted for establishing a society, the object of which should be the translation into English of all the oriental works in Europe, or in any other part of the world, containing any information either new or interesting to the European public. As soon as I received this communication, after consulting with the members of the Royal Asiatic Socicty upon the subject, I went to Mr. Lindsay, the late charman of the Directors, and having explained Dr. Lee's plan to him, I found that he was fully aware of the moral and political importance of the object, and that he would willingly exert himself as chairman in getting the Court of Directors to enter into it. I then communicated it to one of our most zealous, active, and efficient members, Col. Fitzclarence, who communicated it to the Duke of Clarence. His Royal Highness also, feeling the importance of it, urged the chairman of the Court of Directors to give it his warmest support; and the result of this communication was that the chairman moved the Court of Directors, and that they subscribed a hundred guineas towards the plan, and put down their name in their corporate capacity as subscribers for a hundred guineas a year. I then, in order to get it the approbation of the head of the church, applied to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, thinking it would be of use to the cause of religion, put down his own name as a subscriber. Wishing to get the sanction and co-operation of the University of Oxford, I applied to Mr. Peel, who took it up most zealously; and by him that University was induced to patronize it, and to promise us the assistance of the Clarendon press. Col. Fitzclarence then obtained the King's permission to put his name down as Patron of the Society, and thus sanctioned by the King, the head of the church, the head of the universities, and the East-India Company, the plan was circulated."

Sir Alexander proceeded to show that the present period was peculiarly favourable to the success of the plan, from the number of oriental MSS, now in the several kingdoms of Europe, and from the spirit of inquiry which had arisen at home and abroad. He adverted to the literary ardour which existed among the natives of India as strongly illustrated by the determination of the Raja of Sattara to erect four "Elphinstone professorships '

The persons who composed this Society, he observed, included the King, the presumptive beir to the throne, the heads of the different branches of the government, and of both Universities, the East-India Company, the governors of the three presidencies and Ceylon, &c.

The moral and political effect of the institution, he was of opinion, must be most beneficially felt in England at the present moment, which approached the period when the subject of the East-India Company's charter would come under discussion, and when this country would be called upon to legislate for the people of India.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

At a meeting of this Society, at Chowringhee, January 2d, the Hon. Sir C. Grey, president, in the chair: it was resolved that the Physical Committee of the Society should be revived; that the objects of the committee be particularly the zoology, meteorology, mineralogy, and geology of Hindustan; that this committee meet at short intervals; that it unite to itself, as corresponding members, persons engaged or interested in its objects, although they may not be members of the Asiatic Society, and prepare for publication, separately, the results of its proceedings.

It was also resolved that Sir Edward Ryan be president, and Mr. Calder vicepresident, and Captain Jenkins secretary, to the committee.

LITERARY SOCIETY OF BOMBAY.

A special meeting of this Society was held at Bombay, the 5th December 1827; Maj. Gen. the Hon. Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B, president, in the chair.

The Hon, the President opened the proceedings proceedings with an address, of which the following are extracts:

"Before proceeding to the principal object of the present meeting, I shall beg leave to occupy a small portion of your time, to take a concise view of the rise and progress of this and other societies instituted for a similar object—that of promoting the study of the literature, the antiquities, the arts, and sciences of the east.

" At the period our countrymen first visited these shores they were wholly occupied with far different objects, their opportunities were very limited, and, engaged as they were in hostilities, or in commercial competition with rival European states, they had not the leisure, even if they had the inclination, to prosecute the study of eastern literature. In the present state of that study among our countrymen, it is pleasing to refer to him who was the first to lay the foundation of our Indian empire, and to discover that he was the first to foster the love of this branch of knowledge. allude to that eminent man, Lord Clive, of whom I can say with confidence, from being in possession of his private correspondence, that no man ever saw more clearly the great utility of obtaining an insight into the native languages, manners, and customs, than he did. I would not be supposed to assert, that he was himself an oriental scholar , but his genius discerned the great benefit that the public would derive from the attainment of the languages by those who were to serve their country in this quarter of the world. We find that this was a never-failing recommendation to his favour and patronage. Among the many distinguished individuals whom the possession of this acquirement, joined to other qualifications, led him to promote, the name of Warren Hastings is pre-emment. That great man, who joined taste and learning to the wisdom of the statesman, gave the first effectual impulse to his countrymen, who, from his example and encouragement, were led to obtain, not merely a colloquial, but a classical knowledge of the languages of India, and particularly the sacred one of the Hindus.

"He was fully sensible that such knowledge was not more essential to promote the objects of general literature and science, than to maintain and improve the political interests and reputation of his country. Entertaining such views, and adopting such measures, he well merited the honour he received and prized, of being the patron of the Assate Society of Calcuttu. This Society, however, owed its immediate formation to Sir William Jones. That universal scholar was endowed with those rare talents which fitted him, beyond all other men, to diffuse through Asia a spirit of philosophical inquiry and literary research. Both his writings and discourses displayed a grace and elegance which attracted all classes to the fane of knowledge, and it was his peculiar talent to strew with flowers even the rugged path of elementary learning; but these rare qualities could not have enabled him to create such a society as that of Calcutta, which attained perhaps its greatest fame at its very birth, had he not found materials prepared to his hand, which required only his skill to give them shape and combination. Amongst those whom Warren Hastings had encouraged to attain a better knowledge of the religion, the literature, and the laws of the Hindus, through the medium of the Sanscrit, was Dr. Wilkins, who, happily for the cause of oriental literature, still lives, and is, notwithstanding his years, as ardent as in his youth in the pursuit of those objects, for the consideration of which we are assembled.

" The Society of Bombay was instituted twenty years subsequently to that of Calcutta. The field was more limited, but it had not been uncultivated. Mr. Duncan, who long presided over this settlement, was one of the original members of the Calcutta Society, and was not only a ripe scholar in almost all the languages of India, but the kind and encouraging patron of those who studied them. The consequence was, that here also the elements were prepared, but it required that they should be united before they could attain utility and strength. This desirable object was accomplished by Sir James Mackintosh, who, without the acquirements in oriental literature of Sir William Jones, had all his ardent love of knowledge, and had, beyond any man I ever knew, the happy talent of imparting that feeling to others. He came to India with a high and just character as an accomplished writer and orator; and the kindness of his manner, combined with the justness of his views, singularly adapted him for the scene in which he The labous of an indiviwas placed. dual can effect little, but the genius that can stimulate and direct numbers can effeet every thing: this was the talent of Sir James Mackintosh. Persons who come to this country in youth, and are altogether inexperienced regarding the literary would in England, are alarmed at the very idea of publishing that information which opportunities may have enabled them to collect. It was the labonr of Sir James Mackintosh to remove this alarm and to satisfy such persons, that, however fastidious the readers and critics of England might be to writers who compiled from works open to every competitor for literary fame, they were always considerate and indulgent to those who furnished them with facts which they could receive from no other source. I am one, your late president is another, and I could mention many more, who owe much to the aid and encouragement he afforded us. I speak. therefore, with full knowledge and with gratitude of the founder of this Society, for such Sir James Mackintosh may be deemed. I also ascribe, in a great de-gree, the reputation it has acquired to the impulse he gave to its labours; and on all these grounds, I deem him entitled to rank among those eminent and able men, who have been distinguished by the success of their efforts in promoting the cause to which the labours of this Society are devoted.

" The Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland is of recent foundation. It already boasts many names high in every branch of literature, and is hohoured by the patronage of our gracious Sovereign: but the nature and objects of this institution are fully given in the preliminary discourse of Mr. Henry Cole-The character and talents of brooke. this distinguished individual led to his constant employment in the highest and most laborious stations in India; but he nevertheless found time to make himself master of several of the eastern languages, and to surpass all others in the knowledge of Sanscrit; besides such attainments, and the publication of many valuable essays, Mr. Colebrooke became eminent in almost every branch of science, and possessed of such acquirements, when he returned to England he soon attained a high rank in the first literary and scientific societies of his native country. This rank and his reputation greatly promoted his efforts towards forming the Royal Asiatic Society: for, whilst all persons from India obeyed the summons of one accustomed to lead in such pursuits, learned and scientific men of the first eminence, with whom he was associated in England, accompanied him into the Royal Asiatic Society, of which he was, by an unanimous vote, elected permanent director.

"The Royal Asiatic Society, thus founded, has already attained fame and rank among the literary societies of Europe. It is anxious to take every means that can promote those objects for which it was instituted, and is most sensible to the obligation we are under of adding to the triumplis of our country, in arts, in commerce, and in arms, by our superiority in oriental literature; but to effect this we have no slight contest to maintain. The study of the languages of the east was never prosecuted with more ardour than it is at present by the principal nations of Europe; I speak from personal knowledge of this fact, as far as relates to France; I also know that, besides those that before existed, oriental professorships have been established in Germany and Russia, and every encouragement given to promote this favourite study; and, from what I have seen, I am satisfied that the most strenuous efforts on our part can alone give us a superiority in this generous struggle; and it would assuredly be no common disgrace to be conquered on a field, which may almost be said to be in our possession. This consideration, and a contemplation of many other benefits that would result from such a measure, have induced some of the leading members of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain to desire an union with similar societies in India, I shall on this occasion speak of the opinions of those gentlemen, merely as they relate to the Literary Society of Bombay. A few days before I left London I was waited upon by a deputation from the council of the Royal Asiatic Society: they stated to me what they had in contemplation; their objects seemed most liberal and highly calculated to meet with the approbation of this Society, and, with your permission, I shall detail what passed at this conference to any committee that you may appoint to consider the subject, and to submit to a future meeting such a proposition as they may deem calculated to effect the object.

"By the study of the languages, and the improvement of their knowledge of the literature, the antiquities, the habits, the manners, and superstitions of the natives of India, public servants will advance, not only their utility, but their individual respectability. I have come to India as unembarrassed by claims of any private or personal nature as any man that ever held the station I now occupy, and I am forward to declare, that when an individual adds a progress in studies of the nature which I have mentioned, to competence in other respects, it will constitute a strong claim to my notice.

" I shall conclude by observing, that while I anxiously desire that the languages, habits, and manners of the inhabitants of India should be the object of our study, I deem it most essential that those by whom this knowledge is cultivated should not only preserve their European character, but that they should improve themselves in the learning and science of Europe. Among the links that bind us to our native country, there is none stronger than that of a community of knowledge and of pursuits. The nature of our habits and duties in this country often tends to alienate us from those of the society in England, and thereby to lessen our enjoyment when the happy time arrives that we are enabled to return from whence we came. Nothing prevents this misfortune, for such it is, more than the prosecution of such studies as I have stated. A man returning from India, who has added to what he derived from a liberal education, a stock of information of the learning, the antiquities, and the history of the east, is welcomed into the first societies, both of England and of the continent of Europe; and I speak with confidence when I assert, that he will meet a reception that the possession of money cannot purchase, and, as far as the gratification of every honourable feeling is concerned, prove that knowledge is the best wealth."

On the conclusion of the address, the following resolutions were moved by the hon, the president.

Ist. That this Society deems it extremely desirable, that measures should be adopted without delay for opening a communication with the "Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland," and soliciting the formation of a connection with that body, in order to give greater efficiency to the literary and scientific pursuits of this Society, and in the hope of contributing by such an alliance to the common cause in which the two associations are engaged.

2d That it be referred to the consideration of a special committee to report, for the information of the Society, on the best method of accomplishing such an union

The resolutions were carried unanimously, and a special committee was appointed.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

The meeting of this Society, held at the rooms of the Asiatic Society on the 9th January, for the purpose of distributing rewards to the most successful cultivators of European vegetables, afforded highly satisfactory proofs of the good effects resulting from the measure. Above fifty native Malees attended with specimens of their garden-produce, which would not have been, in many instances, a discredit to Covent Garden. The potatoes, peas, cabbages, and cauliflowers were of the very best quality, and of uncommon size. Some of the turnips also were of extraordinary dimensions.

Most of the resident members of the Society were present, and expressed themselves fully satisfied with the exhibition, which was considered superior to that of last year. It was satisfactory also to find that the medals then distributed were carefully preserved by those to whom they were presented, who seem to value them not more for their intrinsic worth than as honorary distinctions.

CAPTAIN CLAPPERTON.

The following particulars of the death of Captain Clapperton, R.N., we have just received from the mouth of Richard Lander, his servant, who attended him in his last moments.

It was on the 13th of April 1827, at six o'clock in the morning, that this intrepid traveller breathed his last, at the city of Sockatoo, about fifteen days' journey from Timbuctoo. His illness lasted thirty-two days. The complaint by which he was lost to the world was dysentery. He appears to have been perfectly aware of his approaching fate, was quite resigned to it, and died in the arms of his servant, without a struggle. The captain was thirty-eight years of age.

It is consoling to know, that in the trying circumstances in which he was placed, oppressed by consuming illness in a forcign land, he did not lose sight of the value of the consolations of religion. Every Sunday morning he caused Lander to read to him the prayers used in the service of the church of England, and frequently occupied himself in other acts of devotion.

When the captain was no more, our informant washed the remains of his master, and wrapped a clean sheet round his body, which he subsequently enclosed in a blanket, and the whole in a piece of matting, coffins not being known in that country.

The body was then carried on the back of a camel and conveyed to a grave which had been prepared for its reception by Lander and some of the captain's black slaves, in a small garden in the village of Jamigany, five iniles to the south-east of Sockatoo. The camel was led by one of The remains were followed the slaves. to their last resting-place by four others, and by the faithful domestic from whom we have obtained this account. lowering the body into the grave, the union jack was waved over it by Lander, and the burnal service was then read by the same individual.

While he remained at Sockatoo the natives treated him with the greatest respect. During his last illness his wants were but imperfectly provided for, owing to the barbarous state of that society in which he was destined to close his career. Chicken-broth, and boiled milk and rice were the articles of sustenance which were supplied. Beer or wine was not to be obtained.

Major Laing was reported to have perished in December 1825. This is fully refuted, as a letter was received by his wife at Tripoli, dated February 1826, from a village but a short distance from Timbuctoo. In that letter the major apologized for its brevity, which, he added, was caused by a severe sabre-wound which which he had received on the back of his right hand.

Lander also confirms the account that Mungo Park was lost on a reef of rocks which runs from 'the island of Busa (or Boussa), in the Niger. Park got on the reef, and was unable to get off. When the natives saw him they came down and fired on him and his party. Three black slaves and two white companions threw themselves, in despair, in each other's arms into the river, and perished. Captain Clapperton's servant also states that Park's son died at five days' journey in the interior from Accra, in January last. _London Paper.

CHRONOLOGY OF INDIAN HISTORY.

B.C.

Darius Hystaspes.

330. Alexander's conquests.

126. Seleucus.

A.D. 226. Arsacides.

632, Calcd with Mahomedans invades India.

Gharnavi Dynasty.

1000. Mahmood's twelve expeditions into India.

1028. Musaood enters India three times.

1053. Ibrahim.

1080. Byram.

1084. Khosroo. - Khosroo II.

Gaurian Dynasty.

1184. Mohamed.

1206. Koottub, his general.

1235. Altumsh.

Feroze.

- Sultana Rizia.

1250. Byram II.

Musacod.

1256. Mahmood II. 1265. Balin, his vizir.

1289. Keikobad.

Second Gaurian Dynasty.

Firoz first invades the Deccan.

1300. Alla plunders the Deccan.

1316. Mubarik.

Khsero, conquered by 1323. Toghlelik, or Ghazi.

1330. Mohamed III. expedition to China. 1357. Firoz his nephew attends to internal policy; Alzi Buber, Maho-med and Mahmood, Omrahs, grow powerful.

1396. Timur born at Samarcand; invades India: killed in action with 1413. Khizer.

1420. Mubarik, his son, assassinated.

1446. Mahomed.

1480. Allah; throne of Delhi declining. 1525. Beloli, Secunder, Ibrahim.

Mogul Dynasty.

Baber dethrones Ibrahim. 1530. Humaioon, his son.

A.D. 1555. Akber succeeds at fourteen; Byram regent; empire extensive and flourishing.

1605. Khosroo or Jehangir.

1615. Sir Thos. Roe, ambassador to the Mogul at Ajmere.

1628. Shah Jehan; Deccanee war.

1658. Aurungzeb usurps the throne; war in the Deccan; Sivajee and political origin of the Mahrattas.

1707. Shah Aulum leaves Deccan affairs: Rajpoots break allegiance; the Sikhs commit depredations.

1712. Jehandar Shah, a weak prince.

1713. Feroksir, confined by his minister. 1720. Ruffih ul Dirjat.

Ruffih ul Dowlah.

Mahomed Shah; Nizam ul Mulk pays choute to the Mahrattas.

1735. Nadir Shah invades from Persia. 1745. Ali Mohamed Khan founds the Rohillah power in Cabul.

Ahmed Abdallah invades the em-

1717. Mahomed dies, also Nizam ul Mulk, at 104.

Ahmed Shah.

1753. Aulumgir II.

1760. Shah Aulum II. a pensioner of English merchants. Cal Orient. Mag.

CHINESE COINS.

The only regularly stamped coin among the Climese is the tseen, or cash, as it is called by Europeans, an extensive and interesting series of which may be obtained in Canton by the curious at a small expense. A perfect chronological series is of course impossible, but with a little trouble one of considerable antiquity may be obtained. The difficulties which are presented to the eager antiquary, in pursuit of ancient coins in Europe, are here less formidable, the small intrinsic value of the coin, and the immense number which are issued during the reign of each Chinese sovereign, render the facilities for procuring authentic specimens much greater than with us, where the emission has been more limited and the actual value of the coin greater. A large proportion of the cash in circulation here are Cochin-Chinese. They may be known by their being lighter and thinner, and composed of a whiter metal than the real Chinese cash. - Canton Reg.

MANUSCRIPT OF EDRISI.

It appears from a report of the proceedings of the Geographical Society of Paris, that a MS. copy complete of the geography of Edrisi, has been discovered by M. Amédée Jaubert in the royal library in that city. Edrisi wrote at Almeria about A. H. 734 or A. D. 1345. His work contains very curious details regarding the state of places at the period he wrote, but hitherto fragments only have been translated, and indeed only an abridgment of his work has hitherto been known. The present MS contains a multitude of new readings as to names of places, which are extremely erroneous in the existing copies of Edrisi. M. Amédée Jaubert proposes to publish a translation.*—Le Globe.

BIJNEE.

Bijnee, the capital of the principality of that name, is situated twenty-five miles east from Goalpara, in Bengal; lat. 26° 29' N., lon. 89° 47' E. The fort or castle of Bijnee is defended by a brick wall, and is 320 cubits long by 160 broad, and in the form of a parallelogram. On the outside is a ditch and strong hedge of the prickly bamboo, and in each face there is a gate; but in 1809 there were not any doors by which the gate might be shut. The area is divided into an outer and inner apartment, in which the raja's fe-males dwell. • It is also surrounded by a brick wall, which includes a small brick house erected by a servant from Dacca; but up to the date above-mentined the rain had never entered it, lest it should should fall and kill him. There are also a iew small brick temples for household gods, and about one hundred thatched huts.

The town of Bijnee, where the raja resides, and from whence he derives his title, is described as a sort of neutral ground. To the English the raja says it belongs to Bootan, and to the Bootanners he represents it as British property: so that although he has a guard of Booteas, and some sepoys whom he probably represents as British, the officers of neither government interfere at Bijnee. Here (m 1809) he was accustomed to harbour lawless persons, especially a certain Mahomedan jemadar, whose men, under the name of Burkindauzes (lightningthrowers), ravaged Assam, and made havoe in that unfortunate and besotted country.

The reigning raja in 1809 had a fourwheeled carriage constructed after the European fashion, and also a superb palanquin, besides some glass furniture-He kept two male elephants for the accommodation of his deity, and four female ones on which he occasionally rode, but which were more frequently employed to catch wild ones for sale. His band of music consisted of two drums, one fife, and one hautboy of the native fashion. Besides other servants, he had fifty male and seventy female slaves. The detail of his manner of living may be given as conveying an idea of the mode of life and customs of a native prince unadulterated by European intercourse.

* See among the works enumerated in Class II., as translated for the Oriental Fund, in p. 801 ante.

The raja was then (1809) thirty years of age, and had been taught to read and write the polite dialect of Bengal. He had only two wives and two concubines. He usually rose about noon, and occupied one hour in cleaning himself and smoking tobacco. At one o'clock his officers were admitted into a hut near the gate in the outer apartments, and received audience seated on the bare ground, while the raja sat on a low stool, and was rubbed with oil, which unction occupied an hour. He then prayed for a short time, after which he went to the interior to eat such food as his aunt, in whose affection he could confide, had prepared for him. This employed another hour, and was succeeded by a short nap, which occupied about the same space of time.

After this the Bijnee potentate was accustomed to emerge, and make his appearance in a large liut, where any pundit who happened to be at hand detailed to him the news and scandal of the day, or read some poetry to him in the vulgar tongue. At sunset he again prayed, and then the pundits, his officers, or any facctions person disposed to be pleasant, talked to him until midnight. After this he retired to the female apartments to eat and talk with them until daylight, for he had been so alarmed by the fate of his uncle and predecessor, that through the whole night he never ventured to sleep. Once a month he took the air in his carriage, or on an elephant, or horseback, or in a palanquin, but he never ventured beyond the bounds of his estate, nor had he ever been visited by any person of a rank approaching to his own .- Hamilton's East-India Gazetteer, 2d ed.

ASIATIC INTELLIGENCE.

Calcutta.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF EUROPEAN SOLDIERS.

Fort William, Oct. 5, 1827 .- The regulation of the 3d of Aug. 1799, republished in G. O. of the 2d of Feb. 1811, respecting the mode of providing funds to defray the funeral expenses of non-commissioned officers and soldiers of European regiments of H.M.'s and the H.C.'s service, having been found productive of inconvenience and confusion, is rescinded; and the Right Hon, the Vice-President in Council is pleased, instead thereof, to direct that the pay and allowances of noncommissioned officers, &c. of the European artillery, cavalry, and infantry, who may die, shall be drawn up to the date of decease only, and that to meet the charges of interment, a sum equal to one month's pay of the deceased shall, in all cases, except that referred to in G. O. of 5th Aug. 1824, be drawn in the abstract of the troop or company as a specific item, under the head "additional charges," viz. funeral charges on account of serjeant or private A. B.

MILITARY PAYMASTERS.

Fort William, Nov. 9, 1827 .- To place the interests of the state and of individuals as much as possible beyond the reach of contingencies, which unavoidably arise in the multifarious and complicated transactions of the pay and audit departments, especially in regard to the realization of retrenchments and to the adjustment of remissions on re-audit, the Right Hon. the Governor-general in Council has been pleased to resolve, that military paymasters shall not hereafter be permitted to charge the aggregate amount admitted to them on re-audit, nor to take credit for short drawings, without producing the requisite receipts from the parties concerned, in proof of actual payments having been made to them; and these receipts are, in all practicable cases, to be taken upon the back of the military auditor general's notifications of re-audit, which are furnished to individuals.

- 2. In cases when no previous recovery has been effected of the retrenchment which gave rise to the re-audit, paymasters are to specify the same upon making a corresponding charge to the state, which will, of course, cancel the credit previously afforded to it.
- 3. It is deemed inexpedient to disturb the system which now obtains, of pay-masters affording credit in their accountscurrent, quarterly, of all retrenchments made from their disbursements, whether these retrenchments be recovered or not,

4. With reference to sums which have been admitted upon re-audit, or as short drawings, paymasters are directed to render immediately to the accountant to the military department, statements of all monies now lying unclaimed in their respective treasuries on such account.

CERTIFICATES TO INDIVIDUALS RETURNING TO EUROPE.

Fort William, General Department, Nov. 29, 1827.—The Right Hon. the Governor-general in Council is pleased to direct that the following extract (Paras. 18 to 20) from a public general letter from the Hon. Court of Directors, dated the 11th July 1827, be published for general information. Certificates of the nature alluded to the the Hon. Court, in the extract in question, will be granted to individuals proceeding to Europe, on their applying for the same to the secretary to government in the general department.

18. "Applications are from time to time made to us by parties who have returned from India, for leave to proceed again to that country, for the purpose either of following the pursuits in which they originally embatked, or of settling the affairs which have grown out of their former engagements.

19. "It frequently occurs that the parties in question are unable to produce any document, shewing that their conduct has been satisfactory to the authorities under whom they have resided.

20. "We therefore desire that you will take measures for announcing to all parties who are residing under your presidency, either with our permission or with that of your government, and who may return to Europe, that in the event of their making applications for permission to proceed again to India we shall require them to produce proof of their having conducted themselves to the satisfaction of your government."

RELIEF OF TROOPS.

Head-Quarters, Cawnpore, Nov. 30, 1827.—The Commander-in-chief is pleasto order the following movements of corps, in addition to the relief ordered in G. O. of the 17th Oct. last:

13th N.I., from Jumaulpore to Dinapore, to march on the 15th Dec.

40th N.I., from Dinapore to Mynpoorie, when relieved by the 19th N.I.

3d Extra

3d Extra N.I., from Mynpoorie to Bhopalpore, when relieved by a wing of the 2d Extra N.I. from Futtyghur, or by five companies from the troops at Cawnpore, as soon after his Exc. leaves the latter station as practicable: these companies will return to their station on the arrival of the 40th N.I. at Mynpoorie.

2d Local Horse, from Khasgunge to Bareilly; to march so as to reach its destination on the 14th inst.

nation on the 14th mst.

3d Local Horse, from Bareilly to Saugor, when relieved by the 2d Local Horse, so as to arrive at Futtyghur on or before the 23d inst.

6th Local Hurse, from Saugor to Cawnpore, when relieved by the 3d Local Horse. The 24th N.I., on being relieved by the 3d Extra N.I., will march to Cawnpore, as already ordered.

NEGLECT IN FORWARDING STAFF

Fort William, Dec. 7, 1827. — Averse as the Governon-general in Council is to expressing censure, it is impossible to refiain from animadverting on that disregard of established regulations which, in its consequences, throws obstructions in the way of complying, in due course, with the commands of the Hon. the Court of Directors.

- 2. Of this nature is the culpable negligence which, on this occasion, exposes to reproof the stall officers of divisions and stations, who have omitted, during the present season, to forward to the town major of Fort William a copy of the proceedings of committees on European invalids of the Hon. Company's service, as directed in G. O. under date the 17th Oct. 1823. Not one such copy for this year has yet been received by the town major, although about three months have clapsed since the proceedings of the several committees have, it is to be supposed, been closed.
- 3. The documents required by the order above cited are to be forwarded forthwith, and commanding officers are desired to call upon the remiss individuals of the staff to assign their reasons for having neglected to transmit those papers in due course. The explanations they may afford are to be laid before the adjutant general of the army, for the information of the Commander-in-chief, and eventual communication to government.

To obviate in future such inconvenience and delay as have on the present occasion been experienced, a report is invariably to be made to the adjutant general when the original proceedings of committees on European invalids of the Company's service are forwarded to him, that the copy required for the town major has been duly despatched.

SUPERINTENDENT OF CADETS.

Fort William, Dec. 14, 1827. — The Right Hon. the Governor-general in Council is pleased to resolve that the appointment of Superintendent of Gentlemen Cadets be annexed to that of Fort Adjutant of Fort William.

OFFICERS' ALLOWANCES.

Fort William, Dec. 14, 1827. - The posting of foot artillery officers to the horse artillery, and of medical officers to mounted corps, being in several respects analogous to the nomination of individuals generally to situations on the staff, the Governor-general in Council is pleased to render the rules regarding the time from which the latter are permitted to draw the allowances annexed to their appointments, applicable to the transfer of officers from the foot to the horse artillery, and of medical officers from any branch of the service to mounted corps. It is therefore directed that officers of the Hon, Company's service, of the classes above noticed, shall not in future, on their removal to corps in which higher rates of pay and allowances are drawn, be entitled to those superior rates and additional allowances until they actually join the regiment or brigade to which they have been transferred.

2. Whenever a surgeon or an assistant surgeon of the Hon. Company's service, attached to a brigade of horse artillery or regt. of light cavalry, shall be absent from his cops on general leave, his superior allowances of every kind connected with his appointment to a mounted corps are to cease from the date of his quitting it, and during his absence he will draw the pay and allowances granted to a surgeon or assistant su goon of the infantry branch of the service under similar circumstances.

MAJ. GEN. SIR T. REYNELL.

Head-Quarters, Camp Tuckeeah, Dec. 19, 1827. — The Commander-in-chief is pleased to permit Maj. Gen. Sir Thomas Reynell, K.C.B., serving on the general staff of the army in India, to return to England at his own request, accompanied by his aide-de-camp, Brevet Major Meade, II.M.'s 88th regt.

The Commander-in chief cannot allow this distinguished officer to retire from a command which he has exercised with so much advantage to the regiments of H.M.'s service, which have at different times been under his orders, without publicly testifying his unqualified approlation and depense of his merits. His Lordship has but lately performed a pleasing duty in bringing to the gracious notice of his Sovereign the services of Maj. Gen. Sir Thomas Reynell in the field, and he now feels it no less incumbent on him to testify his perfect satisfaction of the manner in which the Major-general has conducted the less conspicuous, but not less important duties connected with his command in cantonments. The discipline and efficiency of that portion of H.M.'s troops which have been committed to his charge, are the strongest testimonials of the skill, zeal, and judgment, with which the Major-general has exercised his authority.

LIEUT, COL. TIDY.

Head-Quarters, Camp Nobulgunge, Dcc. 20, 1827.—The Commander-in-chief cannot allow Lieut. Col. Tidy to relinquish the command of the depôt of H.M.'s troops at Chinsurah, consequent on his being ohliged to return to England for the recovery of his health, without expressing how fully sensible his Lordship is of the high state of discipline Lieut, Col. Tidy has maintained during the time has held that command.

The great efficacy of the system he has pursued cannot be more strongly evinced than by the fact of his not having inflicted one sentence of corporal punishment on any of the numerous recruits who have at different periods been under his command.

The efficiency of that system is further manifested by the good understanding the lieutenant-colonel has established with the civil authorities, with whom he has been in immediate contact; and his Lordship cannot better consult the welfare of H.M.'s regiments in Bengal (interested as each corps must be in the good government of that depôt) than by enjoining a strict adherence, in all its branches, to the regulations which have been so successfully pursued by Lieut. Col. Tidy.

LIEUT. COL. COM. A M'LEOD.

Fort William, Dec. 28, 1827.—At the recommendation of his Exc. the Commander-in-chief, and in consideration of the importance of the command of the whole of the artillery, of the extent of force at Dum-Dum, and of the standing on the gradation list of the present commandant, the Right Hon. the Governorgeneral in Council is pleased to conferupon Lieut, Col. Com. A. M. Leod, C. B., of artillery, the designation of brigadier.

 Brigadier M Leod, C.B., will continue to draw the allowances to which he is entitled as commandant of artillery, but without any addition consequent on his appointment as brigadier.

RETURNS OF BAPTISMS, MARRIAGES, AND BURIALS.

Fort William, Dec. 28, 1827. — The Hon. the Court of Directors having called for returns of baptisms, marriages, and burials, in the ministration of which persons in holy orders were not employed;

the Right Hon, the Governor-general in Council directs, that officers commanding outposts and stations where chaplains do not reside, shall, at their earliest convenience, transmit to the secretary to the government in the general department, statements of the several marriages, baptisms, and burials, the rites and ceremonies of which have been performed by themselves or other military authorities at such outposts and stations respectively, drawn up as correctly, and commencing at as remote a period, as existing records will permit.

2. On all future occasions, when military officers may perform any of the recited ceremonies, they are to forward an official memorandum or certificate of the transaction, as each case occurs, to the sceretary to the government in the general department, in order that the necessary information may be registered, and duly communicated to the Hon. Court.

ESCORTS AT GWALIOR, CODIPOOR, AND KOTAH. .

Fort William, Dec. 28, 1827. - The Right Hon, the Governor-general in Council having resolved to discontinue the separate escorts at Gwalior, Oodipoor, and Kotah, and in their stead, as at Dillice, Indoor, and Lucknow, to substitute guards from the troops of the line, the infantry escorts now attached to the political functionaries at the courts above-mentioned are to be broken up, so soon as they can be relieved by detachments respectively from the Agra and Muttra frontier, and from the Meywar field force; the native officers and men composing the escort companies being drafted in such manner as may seem expedient to the Commanderin-chief into regular corps.

2. In pursuance of the resolution of government here announced, his Exc. the Commander-in-chief is requested to arrange for the early substitution, in place of the escort at Gwalior, of two companies with their European officers from the corps on the Agra and Muttra frontier; and, in place of the escorts at Oodipoor and Kotah, of two companies, one for each court, with their European officers from the troops at Neemuch. These detachments are to be relieved half-yearly, on the 1st of April and 1st of October; and full batta is permitted to be drawn for them, in consideration of any contingent expenses which they may incur during their tour of duty.

3. On the arrival of the relieving companies at their respective destinations, or as soon after as circumstances will admit, the native commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, drummers, and privates, at present composing the escorts in question, are to proceed to join the infantry regiments of the line, to which the Commander-in-chief shall have transferred them, and on the rolls of which they are to be borne as supernumeraries until vacancies occur for bringing them on the effective establishment. His Exc. is requested to assign to the native commismissioned and non-commissioned officers such rank in the corps to which they may be allotted as shall seem proper.

- 4. All men of the three escorts about to be reduced, who, on joining the regiments to which they may be transferred, shall be found in any respects inefficient soldiers, are to be reported to the Commander-in-chief, who will dispose of them at his discretion, and any individuals reluctant to enter the regular army, are to be permitted to take their discharge prior to the reduction of the escorts.
- 5. The people belonging to the public establishments of the escorts are to be discharged at the time the companies are finally broken up, unless any of them shall have been received from the corps of the line, or have particular claims on the service; in either case they will be provided for as may appear suitable to the Commander-
- 6. The European commissioned officers in command of, or doing duty with, the Gwalior, Oodipoor, and Kotah escorts are, on the completion of the above arrangements, to join their respective regiments should no political employment operate in bar to their doing so.
- 7. The officers commanding the troops from which the escorts are now ordered to be furnished, will consider it to be their duty to meet the wishes of the resident, or political agent, for the uninterrupted employment of any regimental officer (who has served three years with his corps) to command a guard or escort, whilst his regiment may remain at the station giving the detachment.
- 8. His Exc. the Commander-in-chief will be pleased to issue such subsidiary orders as may be necessary to secure a speedy adjustment of arrears, and the regular despatch of descriptive rolls, and pay and clothing certificates to the commanding officers of corps, for which drafts may be destined. His Exc. will also issue the necessary orders for the due disposal of the arms, ammunition, stores, &c., now with the escorts.

COURT-MARTIAL.

PWKTAH (A CAMP FOLLOWER).

Head-Quarters, Cawnpore, Nov.28, 1827. -At an European General Court-Martial assembled at Moulmein, on the 18th day of Sept. 1827, of which Major Hilton, of H.M.'s 45th regt. of Foot, is president, Pwktah, camp-follower, was arraigned on the following charges:

Charges .- Pwktah, a Talien, residing within the limits of cantonments, confined on the following charges:

1st. For murder, in having, in conjunction with others, preconcerted, aided, and abetted in the attack on the military post at Kulwee, on the island of Palijoon, on the night of the 5th of July last, or early in the morning of the 6th of the same month, in which Havildar Shaik Ebram, of the 36th regt. N.I., was killed, and several privates of the same regiment were wounded.

2d. For robbery, in having, in conjunction with others, on the night of the 31st ult, or early in the morning of the 1st inst., attacked and stolen, or been accessary to the robbery of the house of Monshooay Monng, a Mahomedan, residing in that part of the military bazar commonly called Sarugong, gold, silver, clothes, &c. amounting in value to 1,400 Madras rupees and upwards, the property of the said Monshooay Moung and his

Upon which charges the court came to the following decision:

Finding and Sentence.- The court having maturely considered the evidence against the prisoner, together with what he has brought forward in his defence, is of opinion, that he, the prisoner, Pwktalı, is guilty of both the charges preferred against him, which being in breach of the Articles of War, do sentence him, the prisoner, Pwktali, to suffer death, by being hung by the neck, at such time and place as the officer confirming this sentence may be pleased to direct.

Approved and confirmed, Comberner, Gen., Com.-in-chief.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Territorial Department.

Dec. 27. Mr. T. J. Turner, collector of Seha-

Mr. G. Lindsay, sub-collector of Sirpoora Mr. R. Woodward, sub-collector and joint magistrate of Belah. Mr. D. Home, assistant to secretary to Board of Revenue in western provinces.

Mr. M. Read, dutto dutto, central provinces. Mr. C. W. Truscott, assistant to commercial re-sident and opium agent at Benares, also assistant to deputy collector of customs at Ghazeepore.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS, PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort William, Dec. 28, 1827.—Infantry. Maj. G. P. Baker to be licut. col. from 21st Dec. 1827, v. Lloyd invalided.

30th N.I. Capt. J. Fleming to be maj., Brev. Capt. and Lieut. Wm. Aldous to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. Geo. Turner to be lieut., from 21st Dec. 1827, in suc. to Baker prom.

Ens. E. de l'Etang, 68th N.I., to be sub-assist, in H.C.'s stud, v. Bracken dec.

Cadet F. E. Whalley admitted to infantry.— Cadet G. E. Hollings admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign.

Head-Quarters, Nov. 30, 1827 .- Adjts., Interps.

and Qu. Masts. of Artillery, posted to troops and companies. Lieut. and Adj. D. Æ. McKay, ist brigade, to 3d troop; Lieut. and Adj. F. Dashwood, 2d brigade, to 3d troop; Lieut. and Adj. F. Dashwood, 2d brigade, to 3d troop; Lieut. and Adj. G. Pennington, 3d brigade, to 3d comp.; Lieut. and Adj. W. T. Garrett, 2d bet., to 3d comp.; Lieut. and Adj. W. T. Sarrett, 2d bet., to 3d comp.; Lieut. and Adj. R. Horsford, 4th hat, to 3d comp.; Lieut. and Adj. H. Horsford, 4th hat, to 3d comp.; Lieut. and Adj. H. Clerk, 6th bat, to 1st comp.; Brev. Capt. and Acting Adj. T. D'Oyly, 7th bet., to 1st comp.; Lieut., Interp., and Qu. Mast. J. S. Rotton, 6th bat, to 2d comp.; Lieut, Interp., and Qu. Mast. J. St. Oxford, 5th bat. Dec. 10.—Lieut, and Adj. W. Cammaris, to 2d comp.; The Lower Lieut., Interp., and Qu. Mast. J. II. Jarvis, to 2d comp.; The Lee. 10.—Lieut. and Adj. W. Cammaris, to 2d comp.; The Lower Lieut., Interp., and Qu. Mast. J. II. Jarvis, to 2d comp.; The Lieut., Interp., and Qu. Mast. J. II. Jarvis, to 2d comp.; Lieut., Interp., and Qu. Mast. J. II. Jarvis, to 2d comp.

Dec. 10.—Lieut, and Adj. W. Conway, 53d N.I., to act as station staff at Bareiliy during absence of Brig. Maj. Hay; dated 1st Nov. 1927.

Lieut. A. Park to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 29th N.I.; dated 2d Nov.

Lieut. E. T. Milner to act as adj. to right wing of 31st N.I. during its separation from head-quarters; dated 27th Oct.

Lieut. W. Stewart to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 22d N.I. during absence of Lieut. Sampsom; dated 19th Nov.

Lieut. P. Hopkins to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 27th N.I. during absence of Lieut. Grant, on leave of absence; dated 24th Nov.

Lieut. G. Green to act as adj. of five companies of 48th N.I. whilst detached from head-quarters of regt.; dated 10th Nov.

Dec. 11.—Lieut. H. Halhed to act as adj. to 7th L.C. during absence of Lieut. Phillips, on leave; dated 2d Nov.

Lieut. W. Shortreed to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 2d Europ. regt. during absence, on leave, of Lieut. Ripley; dated 1st Oct.

Lieut and Brev. Capt. W. II. Wake to officiate as interp. and qu. mast. to 14th N.I. during ab-sence of Lieut. Wemyss, on duty; dated 17th Nov.

Dec. 13.—Lieut. W. B. Gould to be adj. to 42d N.I. during absence of Lieut. Polwhele; dated 1st Nov. 1827.

Lieut. J. A. Barstow to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 37th N.I. during absence of Lieut. Smith.

Dec. 13.—2d Nusserer Bat. Lieut. A. Charlton, 6th Extra N.I., to be adj., v. Lawrence resigned.

Lieut. C. O'Hara, 4th L.G., to actas 2d in command during absence, on leave, of Capt. Speck. Dec. 14.—Lieut. J. H. Low to act as adj. to 39th N.I.; dated ist Dec.

Lieut. W. Grant, interp. and qu. mast. to 27th N.I., at his own request, permitted to resign that situation.

Dec. 15.—1st-Lieut. W. M. Smith, of engineers, directed to Join sappers and miners at Allyghur, and Assist. Surg. E. J. Agnew directed to Join and to do duty with artillery regt. at Dum-Dum; both dated 20th Nov.

Surg. R. McDonald, of barrack master's department, Fort William, transferred to commissariat department.

Fort William, Dec. 20.—Cadet R. H. Durie admitted to infantry. His rank of ensign has been Capt. F. Palmer, 9th L.C., transferred to Pension estab.

Cornet Averell Daniell, 3d L.C., having de-clined to take up his app. in H.C.'s service, struck off strength of army.

Capt. J. Stuart, assist. secretary, to be deputy secretary to government in military department, with official rank of major; and Capt. R. Benson, 1th N.I., to be assistant secretary, in suc. to Maj. A. Lockett, Governor-general's agent at Bhurti-prese. nore.

Jan. 4, 1826.—Regt. of Artillery. 2d-Lieut. F. Miles to be 1st-lieut., from 1st Jan. 1828, v. A. Miles Higgins dec.

9th L.C. Lieut, and Brev. Capt. T. Sanderson to be capt. of a troop, and Cornet Chas. Garret to be lieut., from 28th Dec. 1827, in suc. to Palmer transf. to Pension estab.

Cadets T. D. Bainbridge and G. E. Herbert, of cavalry, promoted to rank of cornet.

Mr. G. Forbes admitt d on estate as an assist. surg.

Licut. J. O. Owen, 5th N.I.: Cornet J. D. Baring, 1st L.C.: and Cornet F. D. Bainbridge, of L.C.—permitted, at their own request, to resign service of Hon. Company.

Assist. Surg. J. Grant to officiate as apothecary to Hon. Comp., during absence of Surg. Muston, on furlough.

Head Quarters, Dec. 18.—Lieut. F. Hunter to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 53d N.I. during absence, on duty, of Lieut. Wintour; dated 9th Nov.

Lieut. A. Bogle, 2d N.I., app. to officiate as dep. Judge adv. gen. to Dinapore div. front 5th Dec., during absence of Capt. Steel on general leave. Dec. 19.—Lieut. Col. P. T. Comyn removed from 53d to 24th N.I., and Lieut. Col. J. W. Fast, from 24th to 53d ditto.

Dec. 20.—Lieut. P. Harris to act as adj. to left wing of 2d Extra N.I. during its separation from head-quarters.

Lleut. C. W. Hodges, 5th L.C., permitted, at his own request, to resign situation of 2d in com-mand of 6th Local Horse.

Assist. Surg. Jas. Corbet app. to 4th L.C.

Dec. 21.—Lieut., Interp., and Qu. Mast. H. B. Smith, 37th N.I. (who has been reported by Committee of Examination "altogether Incompetent do duties of an interpreter"), removed from his situation.

Lieut. G. E. Westmacott, same regt. (who has been reported by Examiners "perfectly well qualified"), to be interp. and qu. mast. to 37th N.L., v. Smith.

Interp. and Qu. Mast to 29th N.I., Lieut, P. Brown (who has been found by Committee of Examination " not sufficiently qualified"), suspended from his situation.

Lieut. R. M. Miles, 5th N.I. (who has been reported by Committee of Examination "perfect dy qualified" for duties of an interp.), directed to duty with 29th N.I., and to officiate as interp. and quart. mast., v. Brown.

Lieut Brown expected to qualify himself within six months, failing which he will be removed from his appointment.

Officer returned to duty from Europe.-Surg. John Sawers; arrived 25th Dec. 1827.

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

Head-Quarters, Dec. 13, 1827.—To be Carts, by Beret, in East-Indice only. Lieuts. A. A. M. Couchy, 10th L. D.; C. D. Allen, 6th F.; D. Humphrys, 13th F.; F. W. Stehelin, 13th F.; das. Grant, 14th F.; H. Clinton, 20th F.; M. Morphett, 48th F.; M. M. Pherson, 48th F.; J. Black, all, 48th F.—Dec. 17. E. Blair, 3d F.; H. D. Courtayne, 59th F.

Dec. 20.—Brev. Lieut. Col. Kelly to have command of depôt of 11 M.'s troops at Chinsurah.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe. — Dec. 23. Lleut. Col. G. Becher, 10th L.C., on private affairs.—May. R. Martin, 10th N.I., on ditto.—Surg. Jehosaphat Castill, on ditto.—Leut. D. Oglivy, 16th N.I., for health—Jan. 4. Lieut. Col. Com. Jas. Cock, 12th N.I., on private affairs.—Lieut. Col. W. P. Pirce, 11th N.I., on ditto.—Leut. Col. C. R. Kennett, 37th N.I., on ditto.—Leut. Cock, 23th N.I., on ditto.—Maj. H. F. Denty, 53d N.I., on ditto.—Ens. Craufurd Tait, of inf., for health.

To Cape of Good Hone.—Jan. 4. Surg. W. P.

To Cape of Good Hope.—Jan. 4. Surg. W. P. Muston, apothecary to Hon. Comp., for tweive months, for health.

Cancelled.—Dec. 28. Ens. T. Ramsay, 22d N.I., to Singapore.

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

To Europe.—Dec. 13. Capt. Van. Cortlandt, 48th regt., for health.—Capt. Hoctor, 59th regt., for health.—Capt. Creighton, 11th L.D., on private faffairs.—Capt. Bertrand, 14th F., on ditto—I'. Ens. Dickson, 2d Royats, for health.—Lieut. Erskine, Erskine, 48th regt., for health.—Capt. Fuller, 59th regt., for health.—Capt. Ellis, 4th L. Dr., on private affairs.

LAW.

The following is a copy of part of the charge to the Grand Jury of Calcutta, on the opening of the Criminal Sessions, December 3, by Sir Edward Ryan, one of the puisne justices.

" Although this is the first time I have had the honour of addressing you, I am sure it is quite unnecessary that I should attempt to point out to gentlemen of your knowledge and experience the duties which you are called upon to perform. Without detaining you then with any explanation of this nature, which I feel to be wholly unnecessary, I shall trouble you with a few observations upon the act of the 7th of the King to regulate the appointment of juries in the East Indies; and then proceed to point out such offences in the calendar, as either from the nature of the crime, or as respects the law as applicable to it, I think it necessary particularly to call your atten-This act of the 7th of the King arrived in India this time twelvemonth, and was the subject of a charge from the Chief Justice at that time. In January of this year the court framed and published its rules relating to juries; native Christians in consequence for the first time served on the grand and petty jury of that sessions, and have continued to do so down to the present time. At the last sessions, Hindoo natives were summoned for the first time.

" Many of the Hindoo natives, whose rank, superiority of caste, or property, exempt them, according to the rules of the court, from serving on any other than special juries, have applied to the court when summoned to be excused, on the ground of their not having a competent knowledge of the English language to understand the arguments or speeches of counsel, or the summing up of the judge; but the same persons have thought their knowledge of the language not so defective as to prevent (providing they were eligible) their acting as grand jurors, in which capacity they have expressed a desire and willingness to serve.

"The act of parliament, however, has provided that the grand jury, in all cases, shall consist wholly of persons professing the Christian religion.

" The willingness of such natives to serve on grand juries is a feeling which, for many reasons, it seems desirable to cultivate and encourage, and arises probably from a natural feeling of the dignity and importance they will derive amongst their own class from mixing with English gentlemen of the first respectability.

"Their belief in their competency to serve on grand juries, though not on special or common juries, is not, I conceive without foundation. Such reasons will occur to the mind of every one acquainted with the respective duties of each species of jury why they may be better qualified to serve on the one than the

" For instance, they will be better able to understand the testimony of the witnesses, as the repetition of questions for that purpose would be little or no inconvenience in examinations before a grand jury. They would have an opportunity of receiving from English gentlemen summoned on the same jury (many of whom speak their own language) a sufficient explanation of the nature of the offence to be liable to apply the evidence to it.

" The investigation itself is much more simple, their duty being merely to inquire whether there is sufficient ground for putting the accused party on his trial before another jury.

" In finding the bill, it is sufficient if twelve out of the twenty-three (of which number the grand jury here always consists) concur: the imperfect knowledge of one or two could not be so prejudicial as where the jury must be unanimous.

" From considerations such as these, I cannot help expressing a hope, that whenever the operation of this jury bill is considered at home, it may be thought expedient to allow to Hindoo and Mahomedan subjects duly qualified, the privilege of serving on grand juries,

" It is unnecessary to point out to English gentlemen the great advantages of trial by jury; and I trust the time is not far distant when this institution may be thought applicable on a more extended scale to this country.

" The punchayet is a mode of trial in use among the Hindoos, and is somewhat analogous to our trial by jury; this has been recommended by the late and present Governor of Bombay, and by the late Governor of Madras.

" Before the establishment of the Recorder's Court at Madras, about thirty years ago, juries de medietate linguæ, composed one-half of Hindoos and the other half of Europeans, were in use. I am informed by those who have inquired into many of their decisions, that such juries are most competent for the duties they were called on to perform.

" As far back as 1783, a committee of the House of Commons reported 'that the use of juries was neither impracticable nor dangerous in Bengal.

" In December of the same year, Sir William Jones, in delivering his first charge to the grand jury of this place, stated 'in the administration of penal justice a severe burthen is removed from our minds by the assistance of juries, and it is my ardent wish that the court had the same relief in civil, especially commercial causes, for the decision of which there cannot be a nobler tribunal than a jury of experienced men, assisted by the learning of a judge.'

"That trial by jury has not been adopt. ed in civil cases in this court, has perhaps arisen from the great burthen that would have been cast upon the Europeans resident at Calcutta (limited as was the number liable to serve), if frequently called away from their occupation to act as jurors in this court. By the late act however, all Christians, of whatever denomination, resident within the limits of Calcutta, and not the subjects of any foreign state, are qualified to serve as grand or petty jurymen in criminal cases. This act has, therefore, admitted to the privilege of acting as jurymen a large class of the subjects of the crown resident here who were formerly excluded, and would, even supposing Hindoo and Mahomedan subjects not at present sufficiently conversant with the English language to take a part in the trial of civil causes, form such a large addition in point of number to persons competent to serve on juries, as to make the adoption of juries in civil cases no longer burthensome or onerous on those who would be called upon to serve.

" At this presidency, though the clerk of the crown, whose duty it is to inquire whether natives liable to serve have a competent knowledge of the English language, has returned several Hindoo natives as qualified, and who have been accordingly summoned, yet no native Hindoo has yet served in any jury in this court. At Madras, however, during the late sessions for the trial of criminal offences, several natives served on juries, and I am informed, from authority on which I can rely, that they were in every respect qualified for the duty imposed on them.

" At no very distant period I trust there will be found in this place a sufficient number of intelligent Hindoos. conversant not only with our language, but also in other respects qualified to become jurymen, both in civil and criminal

" I think this expectation will not be considered unreasonable when the progress the natives are making in the knowledge of our language and institutions, through the medium of the Anglo-Indian College established in this place, is considered. That institution, first set on foot through the intervention of Sir Edward Hyde East in 1816, has since received the most liberal support from the government here. The establishment at present comprizes 11 teachers, and 450 pupils, instructed in the English language. Government allow annually, in aid of this institution, no less a sum than 19,780 rupees. They have a library consisting of the standard works of English literature and philosophical apparatus, to which the liberality of government has lately made considerable addition. You have probably, from your own inspection. ascertained the great progress the students have made in our language, and in the history of our laws and constitution, and will not, I am sure, think, after such inspection, that I am too sanguine in expecting that no very long period can elapse before there is a sufficient number of Hindoo natives qualified to serve on juries,'

MISCELLANEOUS.

COLUNIZATION.

The subject of colonization in India having engaged the attention of the Calcutta journalists in an unusual degree of late, the native part of the community seems to have participated in the interest which the topic inspired; and in the John Bull of January 7, there appears a long letter on this subject, which the editor of that paper states to be (as its internal evidence shews) "the bona fide production of a native pen." As this is a question in which native interests are greatly concerned, their sentiments should not be disregarded; and upon that ground, and also as an object of curiosity, we insert a copious abstract of this letter.

" Colonization, as it is understood, is a measure seldom adopted by governments, but when there arises a want of sustenance for the flux of an overgrowing population; they take the last expedient to transplant them from the place to a distant country, little occupied by the iudigenous inhabitants or less cultivated: but it ought not to be supposed that it is necessary for civilization; the latter is of a different nature from the former; it is only to be effected by means of education and improvement. The former is to avoid the pressing demands of an overflowing population. The former the Indians would never require; but the latter they would carnestly pray for; and therefore it is a question, which ought to be considered, how far it is practicable, rather than to spend on the former, as much time, paper, pens, ink, ingenuity, breath, brains, tongue, and trouble, which, if it were devoted to any given subject, it would be an advantage to the speculators, and contribute in some measure to the improvement of the people."

After recommending that government should establish public seminaries for tho instruction of the natives, and encourage translations from the literature of the west, the writer proceeds:

" The introduction of European colonists in India, under the present existing state of the country, would be a measure highly mischievous to those colonists, and to the people of the country in general. It ought to be properly understood, and, in justice to them, it must need be considered, how far it will contribute to support them, amidst a nation distinct from them in manners, customs, and habits of life; and what would be the resources left for those new comers, as all that was in India has been already absorbed, and all that is now existing is nominal.

"If commercein India may be thought to be the resources, that may support the colonists in their wants and necessaries, it must be properly known, that the commerce of India would not admit of further aggressions; it is rather declining, and we are sorry to observe, that in every year one or two merchants failing—it is not owing to their misconduct or extravagancy, but that the staple price is in several articles so far reduced, that many were unable to cover the loss sustained, and were in consequence ruined.

"The internal manufacture, which heretofore supported a number of people, has been lately destroyed by the import from Europe of the different sorts of cloths and articles for native uses; and those weavers and workmen, who had supported themselves by their profession, have now been obliged to seek employment. This has done a serious evil: on one land, it has excited luxury, and on the other absorbed the means of support of many.

" Agriculture in India, which may be thought to afford those colonists the means of support, it is a vain expectation, without knowing the real state of the country. The grounds which are arable, and the productions which it yields, have not been able to supply even our wants, at the same cheap rate at which we before bought them; not a more distant period than twenty years when we usually purchased paddy, rice, oil, molasses, &c. at the cheapest rate, at a rupee, four maunds of paddy, eighteen seers of oil, and one rupee a maund for molasses; but every one who resides in India is aware at what rates those articles and others, &c. are now sold.

"The above is a representation of the state of the country in general; but I beg to say, in a few words, the miscries under which the half-castes invariably labour. There are number of the half castes who reside at Bandel and Hoogley, many of whom have become players, fowlers, &c.; besides, they follow several meanest occupations; and I have seen, when a relation of mine went to Burisal to employ a half-caste as watchman in the way, and who in his return informed us that there resides in a village called Sibpore a number of half-castes who live by cultivation and employment, such as chowkedars, &c. This has been the let of those unhappy creatures, whose parents may be supposed to have settled in India and left their posterity behind them amidst foreigners in contempt and derision, who would have been more useful to society, and an honour to their fabrily, were they sent to their native country,".

The writer then adverts to the alleged benefit which has been derived to India from the establishment of European factories and indigo plantations in the interior; and to the arguments deduced therefrom in favour of colonization; and he, in reply, gives the following picture of the effect of indigo cultivation, and the character of the planters, which corresponds with the testimony of the late Bishop Helper.*

" That such an interference in the agriculture has occasioned great mischiefs, and is so far injurious, that every candid observer will acknowledge who knows or has seen the oppressions of the indigo planters. The usurpation by European indigo planters has been a great disappointment to the natives from the sources of enriching themselves, which after the revolution existed. However small may be estimated the quantity of ground which they occupy, being under-tenants to the natives, and that may be thought to be of no disappointment to the people: but to undeceive such observers, and to bring it to light, require much time and trouble, and therefore I shall conclude it with a few remarks, leaving the subject for further development. However insufficient are the portions of land on which the indigo seeds are sown, the disappointment is still too much, as it excludes us from an immense quantity of productions necessary for our consumption, and an interference in agriculture, while it affords us nothing for our use; and further, upon a comparative view, we may say, allowing at least 500 beegas of ground occupied by each factory, the productions of it, if it were paddy, may be computed at an average of 10 maunds a beega, the aggregate amount of grain will be 5,000 maunds; and reduce it into 50 seers for one man, it will yield for the consumption of 4,000 persons, and allowing at that rate of five factories in each district, or estimating at once, there will be in the aggregate about 225 indigo factories in this country; and computing, at that lowest rate, the quantity of productions will be 1,125,000 maunds, which will be sufficient for the consumption of about 900,000 natives, affording for the pasturage of an immense number of cows, buffaloes, &c. as also supplying for the other necessaries of the Indians. On the other hand, at what cheapest rate would the rice, gums, mustard, &c. have been sold at the Indian markets, and how easily would the natives maintain themselves, when many of whom, we observe, with great uneasiness, always starve. A more particular account of the oppressions and injuries which endanger the natives by the establishment of the indigo factories, will be exposed to the public as soon as leisure from other avocations will enable me to engage in it.

"And moreover, in representing the miseries of the country, it must not be omitted that the variegated sources of commerce have been already extorted by the European merchants residing in the country; they have become indigo factors, cloth dyers, silk mercers, cotton dealers-and also Europeans have become carpenters, builders, joiners, tailors, &c., besides some of whom are turned as vender of several other articles of merchandizes which form parts of the commerce in India; and perhaps nothing now remains for resumption, which the radicals and reformers may be supposed to reserve for the colonists whom they are anxious to invite to India; nor will they be blind to the miseries of the natives, when it is evident that the Euroropean merchants and residents have become the accumulators of Indian wealth. and the natives have turned their working tools and instruments to their happiness.

" All the advantages that may be thought to result from the introduction of European colonies in India, or the happiness which the country may be conceived to afford to the colonists, the consequence will be mischievous to the antives, and a disappointment to the colonists themselves, when in expectation of happiness, they are to turn peasants and cultivators, and exposed amidst foreigners in contempt and derision."

It would more contribute to the glory of the radicals and reformers, were their endeavours turned to restore the natives to their native source of wealth and opulence, which have been extorted from them by the Britons.

CALCUTTA BIBLE ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of this Association was held at the Town Hall on the 4th The report of the committee was read. It stated that the committee had received an application from the Rev. Dr. Price, at Ava, for a supply of Scriptures in the English language, for the use of a number of young Burmese noblemen whom he instructs in European science and the English language. " It must afford great satisfaction to all sincere Christians," they observe, "to hear that those who are likely in course of time to become men of influence in the Burmese empire arc, in their early youth, imbued with a knowledge of the records of divine revelation, and may thus, by the blessing of God, be brought to believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him."

SERAMPORE COLLEGE.

Mr. Swan, one of the missionaries connected with Serampore College, has, since the separation between the Serampore Missionaries and the Baptist Missionary Society at home, seceded from the former. This occurrence has been the occasion of much controversy in the newspapers of the presidency, one of which (the Hurkaru) has published a letter containing a most indecent and disgraceful attack upon the character of Mr. Swan, which Dr. Carey and Mr. Marshman have denounced as totally forreign to their feelings and sentiments.

Mr. Swan, in a letter inserted in one of the papers, says:

"It seemed to me truly strange that the epithets weak, pusillanimous, half-hearted, should be applied to an individual, constrained, as I have certainly been, in spite of the severest struggles with my feelings, from the most imperative considerations of duty, to take such an important step. I am persuaded that, had I remained in the Scrampore College, in its new circumstances, with my views, I should justly have deserved to have been thus stigmatized."

TOUR OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIFF.

Lord Combermere arrived at Benares on the 26th November, and took up his residence at the house of Mr. Brooke, the agent of the Governor-general. On the 21st his Lordship reviewed the troops in brigade, and afterwards held a levee. On the following the Itaja of Benares paid a visit to his Excellency, which was returned next day. On the 23d Lord Combermere left Benares for Mirzapore, where he reviewed the troops (the 49th regiment); he left on the 24th, and proceeded by dawk to Allahabad.

From the native papers we learn that his Excellency reached Lucknow on the 11th December, and was received at the suburbs by his Majesty the King of Oude. When the two trains met, his Majesty received his Lordship on his own elephant, and returned to the city, proceeding through the streets crowded with people, and all the houses were splendidly ornamented and enlivened by bands of musicians and singers. The cortége alighted at the Jilwa-khana, from whence his Majesty was conveyed in a litter, and his Excellency in a palanqueen, to the Baherdehree, where his Majesty presented his Lordship with his miniature, richly set with diamonds. His Lordship dined with the King, and on the 13th breakfasted with his Majesty, and at night dined at the palace, and witnessed the singing and dancing of the court bailds, and splendid-illuminations and fireworks. On the 14th his Majesty dined with the Commander-in-chief. On the 15th his Lord-nander breakfasted with the fights of elephants and other animals, and afterwards breakfasted with his Majesty, to whom he presented a curious hooks, and his own portrait; his Majesty, taking a sabre from his own side, girded it upon his Excellency. On the 16th his Excellency returned to his tents with the intention of marching to Furrukabad.

CHOWRINGHEE THEATRE.

The Right Hon, the Governor General and Countess Amherst honoured this theatre with their presence on the 28th December. The entertainments were Paul Pry and The Miller and his Men. We subjoin a criticism on the first piece from the Government Gazette:—

The success of the performance of Paul Pry at Dum-Dum led, we suppose, to its repetition at this theatre, and attracted a more numerous audience than has been witnessed within its walls for some time past. We trust the good people were gratified, but, in our estimation, the piece was ill suited to the meridian of Calcutta, or to the acknowledged taste of its inhabitants.

The idea of an impertinent fellow, ever anxious to pry into the concerns of his neighbours, is by no means novel, and is to be found exhibited in several lights in the French and English drama. In those cases, however, the incidents are subordinate to the course of a regular plot, whilst in the farce the character is rendered diverting by multiplying ridiculous situations without much regard to the interest of the story. Descending also to the region of farce, the impertinences of the hero are less restrained by attention to consistency or probability, and his inquisitiveness is made more abrupt, microscopic, and grotesque. One or two lucky cant phrases have also been hit upon successfully, and a piece of inert matter, in the shape of an umbrella, has been rendered subservient to the general entertainment.

These ideas, once embodied, are capable of being endlessly extended, and Paul Pry may be placed in an indefinite number of ludicrous situations; whilst, as the chief wit of "I hope I don't intrude," and such expressions, lies in their repetition, the oftener they are repeated the more facetious they become. Accordingly it seems, that almost every theatre in England, winter or summer, large or small, has a Paul Pry of its own, the spurious progeny of the genuine hero of the Haymarket, who has never yet, we believe, put on a typographic dress, and been thus placed at the command of any but its first retainers.

We need not tell our dramatic friends. that there are various styles of acting at home, from the classical boards of Drury Lane or Covent Garden to the temporary booth at Bartholomew Fair (alas! now no more!) at which provision must be made, adapted to the tastes of their respective audiences. What is pronounced in the best gout at the former, is denounced as insipid at the latter; whilst the strong draughts administered at Astley's or Sadler's Wells, would stifle the more delicate organs of the visitors of the regular theatres. The Paul Prys partake of this distinction, and their humour is characterized by the place where they are performed, or the persons to whom they are addressed. The Paul Pry of the Haymarket, by Poole, is an elegant little composition; the plot good, and the characters well drawn. The Paul Pry of Friday night is a native, we believe, of the Olympic Circus, and we should hope, therefore, for the credit of our dramatic tastes, that he may be considered as something of an intruder at Chowringhee. The drama bears no resemblance whatever to the Paul Pry of the Haymarket, excepting in name and a few expressions, such as "I hope I don't intrude;" "Just dropped in;" " Well, if ever I do another kind thing again!" &c. In no other respect is this Olympic trumpery like the play in which Liston is so justly celebrated. The wit, indeed, is all practical; plot there is none, the attempts at character very unhappy, and the jokes very coarse, to say the least of them.

The house was exceedingly full, but the performance was considered dull, and many quitted the house before the curtain fell.

UNITARIAN MISSION.

A general meeting of the friends and supporters of Unitarian Christianity in Calcutta took place on Sunday, the 30th December; Theodore Dickens, Esq., in the chair.

A report from the Unitarian committee was read by Mr. Adam; it was of considerable length.

The design of the report was stated to be to communicate information to Unitarian Christians in different parts of the world, respecting what has been done, what is doing, and what is proposed to be done, for the promotion of Unitarian Christianity in India. The first endeayour of the committee after its institution was to secure foreign co-operation, in which, they state, they have succeeded to a considerable extent; both American and English Unitarians have contributed liberally to aid them in their labours. The first object accomplished by their united means was the employment of a Unitarian missionary; and another object, for the attainment of which a public subscription has been opened, is the erection of a chapel for English worship in Calcutta. The latter object was especially urged in the report as essential to give full efficiency to the mission. After detailing the proceedings and intentions of the committee for the diffusion of religion and knowledge by means of lectures to the natives, schools, tracts, &c. a summary view was given of the state of the funds, which were classed under three separate heads: the permanent fund, amounting to Sicca Rupees 25,000, the interest of which is applied to the support of a missionary; the chapel fund, having a cash balance of about Sicca Rupees 9,000 in its favour after the purchase of ground for 12,000 rupees, besides Calcutta subscriptions still remaining unpaid to the amount of 5,000 or 6,000 rupees; and the general fund, or fund for contingent expences, which consists of annual, quarterly, and monthly subscriptions, and donations amounting to 160 rupces per month. Adverting to the defective organization of the committee, occasioned by the peculiar circumstances in which it had taken its origin, the gentlemen composing it recommended a more complete organization under a new and more comprehensive name, that of The British Indian Unitarian Association, and with that view proposed a series of resolutions for the consideration of the meeting, which were agreed to.

Amongst the native members present were Ram Mohun Roy (who was labouring under severe indisposition), Durakanath Thakoor, and Tarachand Chuckraburtee.

SIR C. METCALFE'S ENTERTAINMENT.

A splendid entertainment, consisting of a ball and supper, was given by Sir Charles Metcalfe, Dec. 21, to the Right Hon, the Governor General and the Counters Annherst. The company amounted to about 600 persons, comprising all the rank, beauty, and fashion of Calcutta.

In the course of the evening, a group of visitors made their appearance in the proper costume of the principal characters in Shakespeare's plays, led on by Prospero, and the rear brought up by Dogberry. Or reaching the gorgeous pavilion where the Governor General and his party were seated, Prospero delivered an appropriate address,

The several personages in the group then mixed in the dance, exhibiting sundry amusing anachronisms. Falstaff led out a fashionable beauty of the ancien regime. The Ghost of Hamlet too might be observed holding converse with Tutania, until scared a little by the sudden appearance of Bottom, who just brayed his approbation on the scene and then vanished. Shylock also, for a moment, forgot his bond and spoke to some lady whom he recognized; while Henry VIII. addressed Lady Percy, and Anna Bullen replied to some remark of Dr. Caius, who did not at all appear surprised to see Oberon treading on the toes of the vernacular Dogberry, or the haughty Wolsey holding a long confab with a jolley carter.

MOALMEIN.

A correspondent in the John Bull thus writes from the new settlement of Moalmein, or as he spells it, Mulmehyne:

In the month of February Mulmehyne exhibited an unpromising scene of desolate confusion, and from its surrounding piles of dilapidated temples, and its path-less water, no one expected that even European ingenuity and industry could have already rendered it the delightful and picturesque spot that it may now be considered. The uniform construction of the houses and public buildings, the regular allotment of ground attached to each, are agreeably varied by the intersection of roads, which have been admirably formed with skill and judgment, and are now so extensive as to be capable of admitting the use of vehicles of any description. One of the principal roads is carried over an extensive range of high ground, and presents a commanding view of a most magnificent scenery. Martaban and the hills in its vicinity; the winding course of the river, interspersed with islands; and, again, the unobstructed view of the more distant landscape, completes a picture seldom excelled by oriental prospects.

INSURANCE OF LIVES IN ENGLAND AND

We do not wish to alarm our readers, but to convey a piece of information to them which may, perhaps, induce them to take care of themselves, and thus obviate the evil to which their attention is directed. On what data the calculation is made, we are not aware, but we observe, that under the most favourable circumstances, the chance of life in this country is regarded at home as nearly 100 per cent. worse than in England, at least up to the age of fifty, when the proportion rather improves. The following is the scale of premiums demanded by the Asylum Life Assurance Company, for the ages specified, on lives in England and India, the latter being restricted to the civil service.

| Age.  |           | Premium.England. |    |    | India. |     |    |    |
|-------|-----------|----------------------|----|----|--------|-----|----|----|
| Žl pe | r cent. ; | £ı                   | 13 | 10 |        | £З  | 13 | 7  |
| 30 .  |           | 2                    | 3  | 5  |        | 4   | 5  | 1  |
| 40 .  |           | 2                    | 19 | 4  |        | 5   | 7  | 3  |
| 50    |           | 4                    | 4  | 1  |        | . 7 | 3  | 10 |

We confess we should like to know the principles on which these rates are constructed, as we are very much disposed to question question their accuracy, and to suspect that in the civil service of this country, except under peculiar circumstances, the average duration of life does not fall short of the period of existence in colder climates.—Cal. Gov. Gaz., Oct. 22.

BENGALRE LITERATURE.

A work, which we doubt not will be found extremely useful, has just been published at the Baptist Mission Press, viz. a Dictionary of Bengalee and English, by Tarachand Chuckraburtee. We have the greater satisfaction in noticing this very creditable work, inasmuch as it may be reckoned the first fruits of the Hindoo college, our young lexicographer having been educated at that excellent institution.

—India Gaz., Dec. 31.

CONVERSIONS IN THE SOUTH OF INDIA.

The December number of the Missionary Intelligence has been published, and contains the conclusion of the account of the Tinnevelly mission; in the preceding part of the account, the public was informed that most of the converts in that quarter had been made from idolatry, and that only a few, who were formerly Roman Catholics or of the old Tanjore mission, had joined them, and although the generality of these new Christians belong rather to a low than to a high caste, the missionaries very justly ask "when we see the rich and high despise or neglect the gracious message, and the poor and low receive and esteem it, shall we reject them because they are of a low caste?

The following are some of the remarks made by Messrs. Rhennus and Schmid on the previous character and habits of the converts, and the effects of conversion on their after habits of life:

"They were all idolators and superstitions, devoted to the common gods of the Hindoos, and to other idols of their own making, which represent devils; impure in thought, word, and action.

" As to the effect which their conversion has had upon them we cannot of course speak very particularly as we are mostly at a distance from them. Our opinion of them rests therefore principally upon the testimony of others, though many of those things, we are going to mention have fallen under our own notice. First then, they have all rejected idolatry, and learn to worship God in spirit and in They are desirous of being instructed in the wholesome truths of the Gospel, and men and women, and even children, assemble daily together for the purpose, especially on the Sabbath-day. A great many of them know the catechism by heart, and not a few have learnt also parts of the Scriptures by heart, such as the sermon on the mount, &c. That they do this instead of joining in their former wild dances and idol worship, spending whole nights in revelling and obscene songs and actions, is certainly in their favour. A number of them were formerly devotees to idols, &c. they have left off all these things, they have delivered over to us their clubs, idolatrous clothes, &c. and sit now with the rest soberly listening to the word of God, learning to trust in the living God, and not in lying devices. They are getting more cleanly in their habits, and shew a more decent behaviour in every respect. At their marriage ceremonies they submit to the simple style required by Christian principles, discarding all the foolish and stupifying customs of the heathen on those occasions; a circumstance of no small importance when it is considered how tenacious the natives are of making a great show at marriages. The noise of quar-relling and fighting is hardly ever heard in their streets, and they learn to live together in peace and harmony. The cruel treatment and persecution of their heathen neighbours they learn more and more to bear with patience, and not to render evil for evil. Lying is much abated among them, and they learn to love truth and righteousness, and are ready to confess their faults. One congregation consists in part of Maravers; they have left off altogether their night expeditions for plunder and robbery, and live peaceably by the produce of their lands. Some of them have been baptized, who confessed on the occasion, that at first they had asked for Christian instruction from worldly motives, but that having since learnt the nature of Christianity, they were ready to abide by it any rate; they give us much pleasure: others have made the same confession. Even the heathen give the converts a good testimony, and observe a very favourable change in their character.

TELEGRAPHS IN INDIA.

Our readers will have some idea of the effective state to which the system of telegraphs has already been brought to on this side of India, although but very recently established, when we mention that in favourable weather, in eight minutes, a return has been made through a line of 400 miles to a communication from the presidency, or at the rate of 100 miles in the minute. The line of signals now reaches as far as Chunar, about 500 miles from Calcutta. In no other quarter of the world has a system of telegraphs been carried to such an extent.—John Bull, Jun. 7.

FXTRACTS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS.

Incknow.—His majesty (the new King of Oude) lately held an assembly of learned learned and hely men at the Dil-aram, Elephants were sent to convey the principal, and an immonse assemblage of philosophers, sheikhs, and dervishes were collected and entertained by the best mu-sical performers. His majesty, after a long and interesting conversation with his guests, conferred upon ten of the sheikhs a pair of shawls each, and a coat and cap on twenty others, and sent a dress and five thousand rupees to Kutch Azim, who is reckoned amongst the sheiklis. On another occasion an order was issued to the Kotwal, stating, that although the prepara-tions of spirituous liquor within ten coss of the capital was prohibited, yet it appeared that no notice was taken of this, and also that the Kotwal's people levied a tax upon the passports given to travellers, conduct which would be severely punished if not reformed. The shopkeepers of Nawaz Gunj brought the corpse of a man who poisoned himself with opium, in consequence of having been beaten by a trader, one Tara Chand, to whom he owed thirty rupees. The trader was ordered to be put in prison until the heirs of the deceased should consent to compromise the matter. Orders were issued to the Kotwal, that the duties on grain should be no more than those imposed by the Nawab Sadat Ali Khan, and whereas the people of the city, and the musical professors complained of the extortions and oppressions of the police, orders were issued, that in no case should more than the due penalty be enacted, and that no tax should he levied on public dancers and singers. Raja Rus Lal was apprised, that farming the intelligence department was unjust, and the news writers and hurkarus were to receive wages from the state.

Maharaja Runjit Sinh .- His highness was at Lahore to the 23d of November, but his tents had been sent off towards Dina Nazar. On the 8th he visited the holy descendant of Nanak at the mausoleum of Jehangir, and presented him with 5,000 rupees. This venerable personage, however, complained that the teachers of the Sikh creed were no longer cherished in the country, and that every one that pleased plundered their villages, and insulted them with impunity. The maharaja replied, that the prosperity of the country was owing to their prayers, and that if any of their lands had been invaded they had only to demand assistance, and a body of horse should be sent immediately to clear their estates of all marauders. On the 19th hurkarus arrived from the camp of Prince Kherg Sinh, with despatches from the prince and Mons. Allard, stating that in the last campaign, the zemindars of Pand Cherampur supplied Maulair Jemaill's followers with grain, in punishment of which they had been driven out of the place and their effects plundered. A camel courier was sent off to desire the army to move quickly to the Peshawer, where the Yusef Zeis were committing depredations.

Peshawer. — Advices of the 21st November report, that Sayed Ahmed and Sayed Mahomed, with 15,000 horse and foot had advanced to the stations of the Yusef Zeis, and were ravaging the districts of Peshawer. Akram Ali Khan, the foster brother of Purdil Khan, had raised a force in Deret Jungul and committed depredations. The Hakem of Peshawer had sent 5,000 horse against him, and had written to the Killader and to Dost Mahommed Khan, announcing the approach of Kherg Sing, and recommending them to be on the alert.

Maharaja Janaki Rao Sindhia.-On the 18th of November his highness set out to hunt lions at Baghburan where he arrived on the 20th. On the 21st the chace was commenced and a lion was started, but he got away after wounding several of the men on foot severely. On the following day, Raghu Rao with his troopers resumed the chase and started the animal, when Bustem Ali Khan, subadar, dismounted with some of his men, and came upon and killed the lion but not until four of the party were much lacerated. The maharaja bestowed rewards on the individuals who had distinguished themselves .- Jami Jehan Numa.

CHANGE OF MINISTRY AT OUDE.

Upon the accession of the reigning King of Oude, his majesty showed a marked attention to Mooatamud-ud-Dowla, better known by the name of Hukeem Mehdee, who was disgraced by the late king and has lived in splendour at Futteyghur. After lavishing many honours upon him, making him presents in money and jewels to the amount of about a crore of rupees (according to the Oude court newsman) and visiting the Nawab, the king has formally reinstated him in his post of prime minister. He arrived at Lucknow on the 30th December; the ex-minister was about to be escorted out of the Oude territories by a military force.

DISTURBANCE AT GWALIOR.

We have not been able to collect any particulars as to the rumoured disturbance at Gwalior, nor have we learned how it originated or what end it had in view. It is stated, on the authority of private letters, that Captain Stubbs, who commands Scindiah's contingent, had lost an arm in the affray. If we can depend on the statement that the troops had been ordered to march towards Gwalior, we should infer that there was something more in the matter than a mere tumult or quarrel amongst Scindiah's own adherents within the fort. —Cal. John Bull, Jan. 3.

THE RACES.

The second December meeting took place on the 24th of that month. The Governor General and his family attended the race course. The sport was good. On the first day, Col. Gilbert's English mare Constance was beaten by Mr. Marjorianks' Arab horse Twist. A serious accident occurred on the course, owing to the imprudent folly of a native lad in attempting to ride across it during a race. The two foremost horses, ridden by gentlemen, came against the lad with great violence and all fell; the former were thruwn but not much hurt, but the unfortunate cause of the accident was severely injured.

BRUTE FIDELITY.

A writer in a Calcutta paper says :-I happened to call upon a lady of my acquaintance the other evening, when she informed me that a short time ago, while reclining on a couch in a room on the ground floor of her house reading, she felt something creeping slowly over her head; and as she was about to raise her arm for the purpose of scaring the intruder, which she concluded was a fly, a favourite little dog, which was attentively watching her, sprung upon the pillow of the couch, when the unwelcome visitor retired with a hissing sound: the lady leaped up in alarm, and was much surprised to discover creeping under the pillow a cobra capella snake, about three feet in length. The reptile made its escape into a rattan clothes-basket, from which it was shortly dislodged, and, I need not add, instantly destroyed.

MAJOR SNODGRASS'S " NARRATIVE OF THE BURMESE WAR."

The Oriental Magazure of Calcutta (No. XIII.) contains some severe strictures upon the "Narrative of the Burmese War," published by Major (now Col.) Snodgrass last year, of which it says that "if any thing is expected from it beyond what the public despatches and newspapers can afford, disappointment will be experienced, since, as compared with these ordinary and everyday vehicles of intelligence, the volume singularly defective in information." The writer, moreover, charges Major Snodgrass with omissions traceable to reasons, far from creditable to the Major as a candid and impartial recorder of events.

As persons resident in India are best competent to form an accurate judgment of the merits of such a work as this, and to correct the mistakes or misrepresentations of the writer, we shall give the substance of the remarks of the reviewer of Major Snodgrass's Narrative, where he appears to have best established his charges against that writer.

The critic complains, in the first place, of the entire omission of the details of the military operations in Assam, Sylhet, and Arracan, in a work professing to be a " Narrative of the Burmese War. He then accuses him of bestowing inflated encomiums on the bravery of the enemy, who only displayed, however, a regardlessness of life as danger pressed upon him, "because taught by his own customs to give no quarter, and expecting as little."
The critic then adverts to the effect of the example of the Burmese, in producing in the British soldier and sepoy what, in other circumstances, would have been deservedly called, he says, the most atrocious barbarity. He adds :- " We should feel happy, for the honour of the British name. if we could add, that any attempts were made to check the progress of this san-guinary spirit. But Major Snodgrass is silent on the part which Sir A. Campbell took on this occasion. Let us hope that the annals of the war, when they come from less poisoned and more impartial pens than his, will not tell a tale of orders not to spare a man, that, at this period, at least, of the war, would account for too much of the sanguinary and revolting encounters which Major Snodgrass would impute solely to the character and customs of the enemy."

In the affair of Kykloo, in which our troops were defeated, and which Major Snodgrass passes over in silence, the critic alleges that it was owing to no European troops being sent with Col. Smith, notwithstanding that officer requested they might be furnished him; and he considers that Major Snodgrass, being from his official situation enabled to assign the reason why none was sent, has forfeited his claim to the credit of a candid and impartial historian in withholding that information.

In relating the attempts of the Burmeso to take possession of Rangoon, the accuracy of the Major's statements is disputed, "on more occasions than one;" namely, where he estimates the number of "invulnerables" as consisting of several thousands, instead of only one thousand. He then observes: " How far also Major Snodgrass allowed private feelings to interfere with his distribution of the praise due to the troops employed in the skirmishes and engagements he narrates, we cannot pretend to say : but when we find the names of distinguished officers never once mentioned in his work, and the body guard, which behaved so gallantly, spoken of as 'a troop of dragoons,' and in this manner, with many of his English readers, stript of the laurels they had so nobly earned, we must be permitted to entertain our suspicions:

and having had access to know something of what took place behind the scenes, we feel the less hesitation in the expression of our suspicion, that Major Snodgrass has sacrificed the impartiality of the historian to the feelings of the partizan. The turgid and inflated style of our author, and the abusive epithets in which he abounds, when speaking of the Burmese, remind us of the language of several of Sir Archibald Campbell's own despatches; but they certainly were not like Major Snodgrass's book, altogether silent on the exploits of the body guard at Pagam, when under the command of a subadar major; they excited the admiration of the whole army, and were the subject of praise in a special general order. We also suspect much, that when Major Snodgrass lavishes his praise on 'the high bearing'-' undaunted spirit'- 'calm indifference,' and 'cool determination' of the 'British troops,' he scarcely includes the sepoy soldiers and officers under the designation." again, a little further on: " With those, indeed, who are ignorant of the real state of matters, he may succeed-not in raising British courage higher than it has stood in public estimation-but in impressing a belief on the public mind, that when Sir Archibald Campbell gained a battle over the Burmese, he added a page to the military annals of England, worthy of taking its place by the side of Waterloo itself. It is by such writers as Major Snodgrass that such men as Mr. Wynn, who certainly ought to know better, are misled to speak of Rangoon as a 'strong fort,' and to laud the bravery of ten thousand men, with a strong fleet, taking a place which a schooner of the H.C.'s Bombay marine, well armed and equipt, would have found little difficulty in destroying. Will our readers believe that when Major Snodgrass describes the attack on the position of the Shoe Dagon Pagoda, occupied by our troops, on the 30th August, and speaks of 'the compact body' of the enemy, 'rushing from the jungle'—the head of 'the advancing column' of the enemy—the bold and rapid advance of the DENSE MULTITUDE,' the tumult of 'the advancing mass'—the dreadful havoc among their 'crowded ranks'-we say, can our readers, on imagining to themselves the reality of the scene, of which the picture is here given from the glowing pencil of Snodgrass, refrain from a smile, when we tell them, that the whole Burmese body attacking our position on that occasion, consisted of ninety men! and the dreadful havoc was the death of one or two men!"

The writer then states other instances of inaccuracy and exaggeration in the book. The Major alleges one great cause of the sickness of the troops at Rangoon to have been their indulgence in limes and oranges, with which the jungles abounded; whereas, the reviewer states, these fruits were in the greatest demand in the hospitals as antiscorbutics; that the commissariat paid largely to such people who would venture to collect them; and that these people were prevented by "another and higher authority," whilst the very oranges, for want of which our men were dying, were seen by an officer, on whose authority he relates the fact, packed up in chests and shipped off for Calcutta! He adds: " Major Snodgrass also forgets to mention the hard labour which fell to the lot of the pioneers, on our troops first landing at Rangoon, employed in digging into the bowels of the stupendous Shoe Dagon Praw, in search of treasure. senior engineer, Capt. Mackintosh (Mads.), refused, it is said, to do this without a written order, which it seems could not be granted; but a Bengal engineer, we are informed, was found to undertake the work."

The statement of Major Snodgrass, that the Bengal division was stopped, Dec. 28, 1825, in its advance, on account of the Bengal commissariat (which the Major is supposed to have viewed, in common with higher authorities, with no friendly eye) having failed in its supply of beef for the Europeans; the reviewer asserts that the commissariat never did fail in its supply of beef, even for a single day; and he alleges, on the authority of the journal of an officer, that the real cause of the halt was the rapidity of the march over roads impracticable for wheeled carriages, whereby the commissariat carts were prevented from advancing, and the cattle were exhausted.

The omission of the names of several gallant officers, as well as the suppression of the services of the navy, are charged by the reviewer upon Major Snodgrass. In relating the attack on Kemmendine, the gallant Major Yates is never once mentioned.

The reviewer charges Major Snodgrass with overlooking what was due to a strict regard to facts, as they occurred, in regard to the attack at Patanagoh. The former denies, on the credit of eye witnesses, the alleged movements of the enemy, as related by the Major; and regards the opening of the artillery upon the Burmese boats, containing the wives and children of the garrison, as not only a blot on our humanity, but "a breach of faith worthy of the Burmese themselves."

He also charges the Major with exalting hyperholically the character of the enemy: "It is evident, indeed," he says, "throughout the whole of Major Snodgrass's work, that he labours to impress his reader with a much higher notion of Burmese prowess and courage than cau, with any justice, be ascribed to these warriors. Never since the commencement of our power in India, was a British army opnosed posed to an enemy less formidable in itself. or from which it had less to fear, on the score of bravery, discipline, or intrepidity; and the inflated language in which our author frequently allows himself to indulge, when speaking of the enemy, can only excite a smile among his fellowsoldiers, whose fate it was to encounter this formidable foe. It was certainly in the weakness of the English General, as unprovided for encountering their customs and climate, that the Burmese found their strength. In every thing else-in every thing of positive or substantive resources or prowess, the Burmese proved themselves, as they were esteemed by our troops, a miserable set of semi-barbarians. Cooped up in a stockade, and expecting, as they were accustomed to give, no quarter, they could occasionally resist individually to the last, and display the appearance of a desperate and resolute courage: but every thing requisite to constitute the soldier in the field was wanting in their character, and the slightest chance of escape was seized by them, even after our troops had entered their defences."

It is mortifying to read these allegations against the credit of a writer of Major Snodgrass's rank and station, and against his book, which, according to his own statement, is "willout pretensions of any kind beyond that of accuracy in the details it may contain."

CIVIL SERVICE ANNUITY FUND.

At the annual general meeting of the subscribers to the Civil Service Annuity Fund, holden the 1st Jan. 1828; George Warde, Esq., in the chair.

The managers having laid before the meeting the accounts of the past year, 1826-27, together with the statement of the Fund, extracted therefrom, which were passed and approved;

The meeting was then made special, for the purpose of taking into consideration the proposition submitted by certain requisitionists, under date the 9th Nov. 1827, viz. "That those members of the Civil Service (thirteen in number) who declined subscribing to the Annuity Fund, on the tender being made to them, shall again have the option of subscribing on payment of arrears of subscription from the 1st May 1825." When it was moved by Mr. II. T. Prinsep, seconded by Mr. Macnaghten, and resolved, "That it is the opinion of this meeting, that in so far as concerns the Annuity Fund Institution, and the interests of the service at large, there is no objection to admitting to the benefits of the Fund, those who originally declined to subscribe to it; and that as there is reason to believe that the refusal, in some instances, originated in misconception of the nature and objects of the Institution, and of the benefits it offered, resolved further, that the case of such non-subscribers be recommended to the favourable consideration of the Hon. Court, in the usual form, with a request that the indulgence of being admitted, on payment of arrears, from the 1st May 1825, with interest of six per cent. per annum, be extended to those now desiring to avail themselves of it."

The ballot then commenced for the election of five managers of the Fund for the ensuing year, and the votes having been taken, the following gentlemen were declared to have been duly chosen: — Messrs. A. Ross, Holt Mackenzie, H. T. Prinsep, E. Molony, and W. H. Maenaghten.

Unappropriated Funds.

|                                                                 |           | Interest. |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------|-----------|-----------|
| Balance on 30th April 1826 · · · ·                              | .1,63,704 | 9,822     |
| Hon. Company's Donation of                                      | 2,66,788  | 16,007    |
| Interest on the Monthly Sub-scriptions of 1825-26 · · · · · | # F00     |           |
| Subscriptions received in 1826-27                               | 3,64,260  | 0         |
| Fines received from three An-                                   | 1,38,251  | . 0       |

| 9,40,587 | 26,2849,40,587 |
|----------|--------------------|
|          |                    |

9.66.871

Deduct:

Establishment of the Fund···· 10,619
Value of three Annuitics transferred to Appropriated Funds 2,00,700 3,01,319

Balance, 30th April 1827 - Sa.Rs. - 6,65,552

____

Appropriated Funds. Balance on 30th April 1026 .... 1,69,900 11,388 Value of three Annuitants from 12,90,700 0

4,80,500 11,388 4,80,500

4,91,888

Deduct:

Deduct: Amount to be paid by the Hon. Court to three Amountants of the year 1926-27 Balance, 30th April 1927 Sa.Rs. 4,63,555

Total Balance of the Funds -Sa.Rs. -11,29,107

G. WARDE, Chairman.

-Cal. Gov. Gaz., Jan. 7.

RESCUE OF TWO MEN FROM A DESERT

The Calcutta Gov. Gazette of January 3 contains an interesting narrative of the sufferings and rescue of two men who had been left an the island of Amsterdam in the Southern Ocean, for fourteen months.

On the 4th of November 1827, the Palmira made the desert island of Amsterdam, or, as it is sometimes called, St. Paul; the two islands, situated in the same longitude, 77° 53° E., and in 37° 52′ and 37° 0′ S. latitude, being often described by either name, in different maps and charts. The island which the Palmira approached was the northenmost: and, passing to leeward, about five miles, a quantity of smoke was distinguishable on the north side, which induced the captain to run in as close as possible,—and, when within a of the shore, two men were distinctly seen standing on a little eminence. A boat was lowered down, and Mr. Addison, the chief officer, proceeded to afford assistance. In less than an hour the boat returned with the two strangers. Their appearance was truly squalid and miserable; they had long beards; their old ragged clothes were patched with seal skins with the fur on. The bristly hide of a wild hog, fastened together, served for the breeches of one of them; their shoes were also made of hog's skin, of the form called moccasin, which consists of a circular piece with the hair outside, and when the foot is placed in the middle of it, a cord, rove through the edges, draws the leather together round the ankle and instep. The name of one was James Paine, about 22 years of age, and of the other, Robert Proudfoot, about 40, both sailors, and natives of Edinburgh. They had been fourteen months on the island.

It appeared, from their own account. that they joined the Governor Hunter, be-longing to Van Diemen's Land, at the Isle of France; and in September 1826 they arrived off the northernmost island. It is customary for these ships to land a number of their crew at the different islands, where seals and sea-lions are procurable, and to take them up again a few months afterwards, with the oil and skins they may have been able to obtain. Accordingly a boat was sent off from the schooner, with provisions and other articles, including salt for curing the seal skins. Paine and Proudfoot were landed at a convenient point, where two huts were discovered roofed with grass, the habitations doubtless of some former adventurers. The boat returned to the schooner, but after getting on board, a small breeze sprung up, the vessel was driven to lecward, and nothing more was seen or heard of her at the island. The two sufferers were thus left to themselves, and, in the morning, examining their resources, they found that almost all the salt had been destroyed by the surf; and that neither of them had even a knife. Their only clothing was on their backs. They husbanded their provisions with great care, having made them last five months. After that they were thrown entirely on their own ingenuity and exertions for every meal.

To keep an account of time, they notched the stave of a cask every morning, but they had committed an error of two days, their calculation bringing the date up to the 2d of November instead of the 4th, when the Palmira arrived at the island.

They found on the rocks at different times a needle, an old knife, and a spikenail; with the latter they made a hook, and a piece of coir rope supplied them with a line, with this they contrived to catch fish, but there being no barb at the point of the hook, they had often the misfortune to lose their prey; the only kind of fish they could obtain was, what the sailors call the trumpeter, and the only shell-fish limpets. They were frequently much dis-tressed for want of fresh water. The rocky surface of the ground not being covered with more than two or three feet of earth, digging for a spring was out of the question, even if they had the means. They had, therefore, to search for pools of rain water, and sometimes they went several miles to quench their thirst. island was well furnished with wild hogs, but they could not catch above five; these they ran down and felled with a stick only two or three inches in diameter. "You must have run very fast for your dinner!" said the captain. "Certainly, we ran fast for a dinner," was the reply, "but the plg had to run for his life!" The flesh of the wild hog was very dry and hard, without fat. Once they caught a few young ones; these of course afforded them a sumptuous banquet.

They attempted to make a bow and arrows, but the branches of underwood and the shoots of stunted trees were found too brittle for the purpose. They could only subsist indeed from hand to mouth, as the salt failed them, which prevented their laying up a stock of fish, and for many months they were accustomed to eat their casually procured victuals without any salt at all. On more occasions than one they were three days without an opportunity of obtaining a morsel of food.

They had a tinder-box when they landed, but the tinder was soon expended, and there was nothing to be found of a vegetable nature dry enough to supply its place. Keeping up the fire in the hut, therefore, during the latter part of their residence, became a subject of most painful anxiety, especially in the night, for if it happened to go out there was no chance of lighting it again, and the preservation of the "vestal flame," seems to have been the only, at least the chief, cause of quarrelling, or difference between them. youngest was a heavy sleeper, so that upon Proudfoot more frequently fell the imperative and indispensible duty of watching, and if they went together any distance from the hut it was usual with them to heap the fire with peat and moss; and, sometimes, for better security, they carried a piece of ignited peat along with them.

One day they succeeded in ascending to the highest peak, where they discovered the crater of a volcano more than a hundred yards in diameter and so deep that no bottom could be seen.

When the Pulmira was first seen, Paine was sanguine enough to anticipate their deliverance, and offered a wager that his notion was right; Proudfoot, less confident than his young companion, derided the idea, but seeing the vessel come nearer they both rushed down from the height upon which they stood, and instantly lighted as large a fire as they could to give intimation of the presence of human beings on the spot. Nearing the island the ship hoisted her colours, and then their happiness was complete, for they then felt certain of their sufferings being at an end. The surf on the lee side of the island was very high, and threatened destruction to the boat. Mr. Addison hailed the men, and the moment his voice was heard, Paine said to his companion, " I am sure that is my old chief mate;" and so it was, for three or four years before they had belonged to the same ship, the Regalia, and had been at Macquarrie island together. As the surf ran so high it was fortunate that they had left a sufficlent length of coir-rope to throw into the boat and hold on by, which enabled them to get on board without much diffi-

SHIPPING.

Arrivals in the River.

Dec. 28. Jane, Jamison, from London. —30. Caircuttu, Mollen, from Stockholm, and Exlipe, Lefort, from Harre de Grace.—Jan. 1. Ernuad, Crostorphin, from Rangoon, and Leda, Northwood, from New South Wales. —6. McCauley, Alken, from Madras.—4. Arthuse, Hally, from Bombay; and Orient, White, from London.—16. Mary Ann, Baucant, from London.—17. Vensita, Mainsley, from London and Madras.

Departures from Calcutta.

Departures from Calcutta.

Dec. 29. Childs Harold, West, for London, and Il'Asie, Ducros, for Bordeaux.—31. Elizabeth, Gautherin, for Bordeaux.—Jan. 1. Welcome, Buchanan, for Liverpool; and Cartha, Lindsay, for Bombay.—2. Steam-vessel Enterprize, Johnstone, for Molmeni, Marquis of Lansdown, Noyes, for Penang, Singapore, and Batavia; and Lady of Penang, Singapore, and Batavia; and Cyde, Munro, for Madras and London.—5. Cumbringe, Bather, for London—6. Kingston, Bowen, for London; and General Foy, Videt, for Bordeaux.—9. La Laure, Charlus, for Bordeaux.—16. Minerea, Probyn, for London (with treasure).

BIRTHS.

Oct. 31. At Kurnaul, the lady of Lieut. Ford Angelo, 7th L.C., of a son. Nor. 28. At Suikea, the lady of G. Wise, Esq., of a daughter. Dec. 3. The lady of Chas. Stuart, Esq., of a son. At Secrors, the lady of Lieut. W. Beckett, th N.I., of a daughter.

17. At Meerut, the lady of John Vincent, Esq., 16th Queen's Lancers, of a son.

20. The lady of R. Allport, Esq., of a son.

21. The lady of R. Allport, Esq., of a son.

22. The wife of Mr. E. Webb, of the government lithographic press, of a son.

23. The wife of Mr. E. Webb, of the government lithographic press, of a son.

24. I. Hunter, of a son.

25. Mrs. John Schorn, of a son.

26. The lady of Major Swinhoe, 28th N.I., of a daughter.

daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Nov. 30. At Chandernagore, Mr. R. Lloyd, to Mrs. Laura D'Anselme. Dec. 9. In the great gaol of Calcutta, Mr. G. Atiat. Journ. Vor. 25, No. 150.

CC.—MAIGITAS.

Wilson, professor of dancing, to Mrs. Wall, of 10. At Chandernagore, F. D. Bogaardt, Esq., his Netherland Majestye civil service, to Diama Levenia, youngest daughter of the late Col. T. T. Basect, H.C. 's service.

14. Mr. C. Scott, juta, to Miss M. A. Graham.

15. Mr. John Low, to Miss M. Mobile.

26. At Chandernagore, Mr. F. Perrier, indigo planter, to Miss A. C. Le Blond.

27. At the Cathedral, Calcutta, J. S. Reed, Esq., to Miss Magaret Fraser.

28. At the Cathedral, Calcutta, D. Mc. Leod, Esq., to Miss S. M. Adams.

29. At St. John's Cathedral, Calcutta, H. W. Cupp. Esq., to Miss M. Mayen, Cathedral, Calcutta, J. S. Reed, Esq., to Miss M. Garten, Calcutta, U. M. Cupp. Esq., to Maria, dungher of the late R. Stanton, Esq., surgeon on the Bengal establishment.

ment.

At the Cathedral, Calcutta, Mr. John Binny, to Miss Angelica Ermer.

31. Mrs. A. H. M. Wright, to Miss H. Fritz.

Jan. I. in Wellesley Place, James Ronadd, Esq., assist, surg. H. C's service, to Agnes, youngest daughter of the late John Mac Nair, Esq., of daugnes of the Glasgow, 5. At St. John's Cathedral, Calcutta, James Shillingford, Esq., indigo planter, to Miss Elizabeth Wells, of Camberwell.

DEATHS.

Dec. 4. Mrs. Anne Wilson, aged 52.
6. Miss Lucy Mackenzie, aged 28.
— Mr. L. J. Gomess, aged 23.
— Ann Fluza, wife of Mr. J. Lief Muffin, aged 18.

10. Mr. Domingo Gaspar, a native of Manilla.

aged 30.

11. Mr. James Thompson, late a branch pilot in the H.C.'s marine, aged 56.

— Henry, son of N. L. Briant, Esq., aged 6 years. 19. Mrs. Ann Hearnes. 21. At Meerut, Lieut. T. K. Skipton, 10th L.C., whose death was occasioned by his horse falling on Mrs. Lucy Mitchell, aged 68.

 John, son of Mr. C. Gregory, aged 10 years.
 Mrs. Eliza Jane Wilkinson, aged 99.
 Mrs. Maria Marshall, aged 28.
 Jan. I. At Chowringhee, Lieut. C. Wiggins, late of the horse artillery on this establishment, aged 25.

Madras.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

REWARD TO A NATIVE OFFICER.

Fort St. George, Oct. 5, 1827.—In consideration of the long and faithful service of Subadar Mahomed Surwar, formerly of the 1st regt. of L.C., the government were pleased, under date the 20th June 1809, to present him with a palankeen, and an allowance of 70 rupees per mensem, for the maintenance of that equipage, as a mark of their approbation of his services, and further to reward them by directing that the amount of his pay should be continued as a pension for life to his nearest heir on his decease.

Subadar Major Mahomed Surwar, having continued to serve the Hon. Company with the same zeal and fidelity up to the present period, the Hon the Governor in Council is pleased as a further mark of his approbation of the services of the subadar major extending to forty-seven years, to resolve that he be pensioned on the full pay and staff allowance of his rank, and that he be presented with a horse and horse allowance of 42 rupees per mensem.

5.0

NON-COMMISSIONED MEDICAL SERVANTS.

Fort St. George, Oct. 5, 1827.—The Mon. the Governor in Council is pleased to direct, that when a non-commissioned medical servant is placed in an Independent medical charge, he shall receive only half the rate of allowance for medical supply to which a commissioned medical officer is entitled.

The following is the relative rank of non-commissioned medical servants, under the new designations, which were published in G.O., dated the 27th of April last.

Former Designation.
Sub-Assist. Surg.,
Apothecary,
First Dresser,
Medical Pupil,
First Dresser,
Second Dresser,
Second Dresser,
And Med. Apprentice.
Nat. First Dresser,
Nat. Formed ditto.
Nat. Med. Pupil.

The Hon, the Governor in Council is further pleased to direct, that the new rate of pay and allowance for non-commissioned medical servants, which was authorised by G.O., dated the 27th of April, shall have effect from the 1st of May last.

PRACTICE OF COURTS-MARTIAL.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 25, 1827.—Much impediment to the ends of justice having arisen from the prosecution, in trials by general courts-martial, being conducted by a private prosecutor, frequently unacquainted with the law of evidence and the mode of examining witnesses; his Excellency the Commander-in-chief finds it expedient to direct as a general rule in this army, and more especially upon all trials for the cognizance of a breach of the public military law, that the prosecution shall, according to the provision of the Articles of War, (Sec. XIV. Art. IV.) he sustained by the Judge Advocate; who must be supposed from his professional experience and acquirements to be better qualified for the task.

In cases of indiculual injury, where particular circumstances may render it advisable that the conduct of the prosecution remain with the complainant, then the same are to be previously submitted for the consideration of the Commander-inchief, in order that his sanction may be obtained to the arrangement.

Oct. 30.—Recent instances having occurred of interpreters attached to Native Courts-mattial being relieved during a trial, this practice is prohibited as irregular. The record of the proceedings of such courts is rendered valid alone by the signature of the interpreter, who must therefore only be relieved, during the proceedings on any trial on which he is sworn, by certified indisposition, in which event, his signature must be required to the record of such portion of the proceedings as; may have been conducted during his attendance, and in like manner the signature of his successor to the remainder.

The proceedings of General Courtsmartial are invariably to be transmitted by the Judge Advocate General, or persons officiating as such, direct to the Judge Advocate General of the army, who will lay them before the Commander-in chief.

Nov. 13.—Instances having occurred of the ondue infliction of solitary confinement, by the award of minor Courts-martial, his Excellency the Commander-in-chief is pleased to direct that six weeks be considered the greatest period, for which such punishment can be inflicted by the sentence of any European Court-martial inferior to a general one.

Nov. 30 .- Several instances having recently been brought to the notice of the Commander-in-chief, of sentences of Courts-martial inferior to general, passed in direct opposition to the evidence before the court, and nevertheless confirmed and carried into execution, his Excellency feels himself called upon to intimate to commanding officers, that he will hereafter hold them strictly responsible for the confirmation of such illegal proceedings; that it is their especial duty to send back for revision all trials whereon the finding or sentence may be evidently contrary to the evidence adduced, and that in cases of unjust conviction particularly, he expects them to stand between the prisoner and the ill consequence of that want of information as to the commonest principles of the law of evidence, which too frequently prevails in such courts, especially when composed of native officers, who too frequently receive insufficient information from the officer conducting the proceed-

Whenever soldiers are brought to trial not under the provisions of Article IV. Section XXI. of the European, or of Article VI. Section XXII. of the Native Articles of War, and for offences not specified in any other of them, it is requisite that the same should be declared in the charge to be "to the prejudice of good order and military discipline."

Dec. 8.—The hour of adjournment, as well as that of assembly cach day, is invariably to be entered upon the record of the proceedings of Courts-martial; and in the event of adjournment at an hour earlier than usual, the cause thereof is to be explicitly stated.

Dec. 21.—Commanding officers of stations and corps are cautioned against bringing to trial, before military courts, persons who are not amenable to military law; as they may thereby subject themselves selves to all the inconveniences of a prosecution in the civil courts, for authorizing that which is illegal.

STAFF ALLOWANCES.

Fort St. George, Dec. 22, 1827.—The Right Hon. the Governor in council deems it expedient to establish the following regulations regarding the allowances of general officers on the staff.

2. That in all future cases of absence on furlough, or sick certificate of general officers on the staff, the present regulations regarding their allowances shall continue in force, provided the absence does not exceed three months, and is not beyond the limits of the authority of this govern-

3. That in all other cases of the absence of general officers on the staff on furlough or sick certificate, the next senior officer shall exercise both the division and his own (station) commands, receiving the allowances laid down in G. O. 3d Dec. 1824, paragraph 20; and that a deduction be made from the allowances of the absent general officer, equal to the additional allowance payable to the officer exercising the temporary command.

The above rules will be, in all respects, applicable to the cases of officers under the rank of Major-general when placed on the staff, and in receipt of general officers' allowances.

RECRUITING FOR REGIMENTS.

Head-Quarters, Dec. 24, 1827.—All recruiting for regiments of light cavalry and native infantry, including the rifle corps, extra regiments, and Seringapatan local battalion, is to cease until further orders, and any detached recruiting parties from these corps will immediately join their respective head-quarters.

Recruit and pensioned boys attached to cavalry and infantry regiments, are not-withstanding this order to be transferred to the ranks agreeable to the G. O. by Gov. of the 23d Feb. 1813, when they have attained the proper age and height, and are in all respects fit to carry arms.

The promotion in native infantry regiments of commissioned, non-commissioned officers, naiques, and drummers, is to cease till further orders, and all casualties in those ranks are to be reported to the adjutant general's office, that the supernumerary of each rank may be disposed of.

DRESS OF OFFICERS.

Head-Quarters, Dec. 31, 1827.—The Commander-in-chief, with reference to the general orders of the 8th Dec. 1823, 12th Dec. 1826, and 30th Nov. 1827, directs a strict observance of all regulations upon the subject of dress, and to require that the dress.

punctually appropriated to the occasions specified.

The only exceptions which the Commander-in-chief can admit of in the costumes of officers laid down by regulation, and published to the army, is, that in consideration of the climate, officers of the staff, of artillery, cavalry, and infantry are permitted (except when dressed for duty or parade) to wear white trowsers in dress and undress throughout the year.

When taking exercise before 8 o'clock in the morning, officers are permitted to wear a shell jacket (as established), with forage cap or round hat, without sword or sash; but though the same jacket is allowed throughout the day when not on public duty, at review or other occasions of ceremony or dress, it must be invariably accompanied with the regulation hat or cap, sash and sword. This order is not meant however to prevent officers, when engaged in field sports, from wearing a dress or hat more suitable to the purpose, but on every other occasion the staff and commanding officers of corps are called upon to take notice of any officer who may make his appearance out of quarters in an unauthorized dress, and for the strict execution in every respect of this order.

The costume in which officers are to appear on particular occasions is regulated by the general order on dress; and to ensure an uniformity, and avoid mistakes, it will always be notified in orders or menoranda previous to a review or inspection or other dress occasion, the order in which staff and regimental officers are to appear.

Regimental officers are permitted to attend public entertainments of ceremony, in review order "dress," and at all such balls, or even dress occasions, the dress coat must be invariably worn by staff officers; but instead of pantaloons and Hessian boots, or silk stockings, and shoes, the white overall with Wellington boots, or loose trowsers and shoes, may be worn on occasions of ceremony, but the sash is on all occasions to be worn with boots and never with shoes.

Officers of departments and commanding officers of corps will regulate the particulars of dress respectively, so as that all may be uniform and departmentally and regimentally appointed.

As breeches with silk stockings have been dispensed with by his Majesty on all dress occasions, but at his Majesty's drawing room for the reception of ladies, they are also dispensed with in this army.

Officers in mourning are to wear the crape invariably above the elbow on the left arm.

COURT-MARTIAL.

ENSIGN HULL

Hand Oundors Phoulten Plain. Dec

15. 1827 .- The following extracts from the confirmed proceedings of an European General Court-martial, held at Masulipatam, on the 5th day of Dec. 1827, by virtue of a warrant from his Exc. Lieut.-Gen. Sir G.T. Walker, G.C.B. and K.C.T. Commander in-chief, are published to the Charge. - Ensign Thomas Hillman Hull, of the 1st European Regt., placed in confinement by order of his Exc. the Commander-in-chief, on the following charge :

" For manslaughter, in having at Masulipatam, at or about four o'clock on the afternoon of Friday the 12th of Oct. 1827, struck with the thick end of a billiard cue, or other weapon, Lieut. Samuel Marshall, of the 1st European Regt., a blow on the head, whereof the said Licut. Marshall died, at about half-past one o'clock on the following morning.

Adj. Gen. of the Army." " Adj.-Gen.'s Office, Fort St. George, 26th Nov. 1827."

The Court having most maturely weighed and considered the whole of the evidence brought forward in support of the prosecution, as well as what the prisoner, Ensign Thomas Hillman Hull, hath urged in his defence, and the evidence in support thereof, is of opinion,-

That he is guilty of the charge preferred against him.

Sentence. - The Court having found the prisoner guilty to the extent above stated, doth sentence him, Ensign Thomas Hillman Hull, of the 1st European Regt., to be imprisoned for the space of twelve months (calendar), from such time, and at such place, as his Exc. the Commanderin-chief may be pleased to direct.

(Signed) D. C. SMITH, Lieut.-Col. 38th N. I., and President. Approved and confirmed, (Signed) G. T. WALKER, (Signed)

Lieut. - Gen., and Com. in-chief. The officer commanding at Masulipatam will give directions for forwarding the prisoner, under proper escort, to the common gaol of Madras, on receipt of this order; and his sentence will commence from the date of his reception there.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Jan. 4. T. Gahagan, Esq., judge and criminal judge of Malabar.

C. A. Thompson, Esq., sub-collector and joint magistrate at Cuddapah.

A. Maclean, Esq., sub-collector and joint magis-trate of Malabar. John Horsley, Esq., additional ditto ditto of Canara. J. S. Lushington, Esq., government agent at durbar of his Nighness the Nuwaub of the Car-natic. H. Morris, Esq., head assistant to principal col-lector and magistrate of southern division of Ar-

H. Montgomery, Esq., ditto ditto of Nellore.

H. V. Conolly, Esq., ditto ditto of Beliary. 8. Capt. Wm. Marjoribanks, master attendant at Madras.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort St. George, Dec. 21, 1827.—Assist. Surg. S. Chippendall permitted to enter on general duties of Assist. Surg. R. Cole app. to do duty under surg. of 1st brigade horse artillery.

Dec. 28.—2th N.I. Sen. Lieut. F. B. Lucas to be capt., and Sen. Ens. John Grimes to be Heut., v. Hole invalided; dated 15th Dec. 1827.

25th N.I. Sen. Ens. C. H. Warren to be lieut., v. Smith resigned; dated 22d Dec. 1827.

Lieut. Col. Alex. Fair, 51st N.I., permitted to resign command of Veilore in compliance with his request.

8th N.I. Lieut. T. L. Rippon to be qu. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Lucas prom.—Lieut. G. D. Blaquiere to be adj., v. Rippon.

Surg. J. Underwood to be cantonment surgeon at St. Thomas's Mount, v. Mackenzie permitted to return to Europe.

Surg. C. Desormeaux to be garrison surgeon of Vizagapatam, v. Underwood.

Assist. Surg. J. W. Sherman to be deputy medical storekeeper at Janinah.

Head-Quarters, Dec. 17.—Ens. T. L. Patch (recently prom.) app. to do duty with 16th N.I. Dec. 22.—2d-Lieut. C. J. Cooke, of artil., posted to 3d bat.

Dec. 24.—Removals. Lieut. Col. Com. M. N. Pereira, from 37th N.1. to 34th or C. L. I.; Lieut. Col. Com. J. D. Greenbill, from 34th or C. L. L. U. 37th N.1.; Lieut. Col. F. W. Wilson, from 37th N.1.; Lieut. Col. D. C. Smith, from 38th to 37th N.1. to 37th N.I.

Capt. P. S. Hole (recently transf. to invalid estab.) posted to Carnatic Europ. Vet. Bat.

Removals of Surgeons. W. Mackensle, from 3d bat. artil. to 9th N.I.; J. Underwood, from Carnatic Europ. Vet. Bat. to 3d bat. artil.; C. Desormeaux, from 9th N.I. to Carnatic Europ. Vet.

Ens. C. Sherard posted to 8th N.I., to complete estab.

Ens. Edm. Goodenough posted to 25th N.I. to complete estab.

Dec. 29.—Assist, Surg. T. Powell posted to 10th N.I.

Fort St. George, Jan. 4, 1828.—Capt, W. Cunningham, 44th N.I., to act as assist. qu. mast. gen. to troops in Dooah, during absence of Capt. O'Donoghue on sick certificate at Bombay.

3d L.C. Lieut. E. A. Langley to be adj., v. Arbuthnot permitted to return to Europe.

Lieut. Col. T. Pollock, 22d N.I., permitted to resign command of Nagpore subsidiary force.

Lieut. B. Stapyiton, 7th N.I., permitted, at his own request, to resign service of Hon. Company. Cadet P. B. Young admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign. Jan. 8.-7th N.I. Sen. Ens. John Nixon to be lieut., v. Stapylton resigned; date 5th Jan. 1828. Assist. Surg. H. G. Graham app. to do duty under medical officer in charge of 11, M.'s 13th L.

Maj. Gen. Sir Arch. Campbell, H.M.'s service (having been nominated temporarily to staff of army of Fort St. George) app. to command south-army of Fort St. Geor Lieut. Coi. R. Armstrong, H.M.'s royal regt., to have command of southern division of army dur-ing absence of Maj. Gen. Campbell.

Col. Sir John Sinciair, Bart., of artillery, appto staff of Fort. St. George, v. Leith, and to command northern division of army.

Lieut. Col. E. Boardman, 45th N.I., to command Trichinopoly.

Licut. Col. J. Brodie, 9th N.I., to command Veilore, v. Fair permitted to return to Europe.

Licut. Col. W. G. Pearse, of artillery, to be acting acting commandant of artillery, with a seat at Military Board, v. Sinclair.

44th N.I. Lleut. J. W. Ramsey to be adl., v. Cunningham resigned.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Dec. 22. Lleut. Col. Alex. Fair, 51st N.I.—Lleut. A. W. Gregory, 3d L.C., for health.—Surg. W. Mackenzle, for health.—Surg. W. Mackenzle, for health.—Jen. John Phillipson, for health.—Jan. 4. Lleut. Col. T. Pollok, 22d N.I.—Lleut. Col. J. Moor, 28th N.I.—Lleut. Col. A. Balmain, 30th N.I., for health.—Jan. Lleut. L. Qu. A. Balmain, 30th N.I., for health.—Lleut. H. Pace, 30th N.I., for health.—Lleut. H. Pace, 30th N.I., for health.—Ens. J. G. M. Nabb, 30th N.I., for health.—Ens. J. G. M. Nabb, 30th N.I., for health.—B. Capt. John Wallace, 46th N.I.

To Sea. — Dec. 22. Capt. W. Thompson, 17th N.I., for twelve months, for health.—Jan. 8. Ens. H. S. O. Smith, 42d N.I., for six months, for health.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE NEILGHERRIES

We are glad to find the Neilgherries are about to be made useful. We believe our readers are aware that it is the intention of government to erect habitations there for the benefit of invalids: this will occasion a great saving to men in office in India; it will in many cases prevent the necessity of a voyage to England, and our honourable masters will likewise gain by the arrangement, as they will continue to benefit by the services of those who resort to the hills instead of going home. The rents, which will be gladly paid for comfortable residences in that delightful climate, will doubtless compensate the Company most amply for any expense that may be laid out in building and furnishing houses there .- Mad. Cour. Jan. 8.

RANGOON.

Recent accounts from Rangoon describe the state of that town to be most deplorable. All trade was at a stand, and the governor was exacting all he could get to assist his government in raising the 121 lacs, which, according to the treaty, are now due to the Company.

The country is described as so poor, that it is much doubted if this instalment can be raised, and there will yet remain 25 lacs more to be paid within this year. The King and Queen will not advance any portion of the tribute from their coffers, so that the whole is drawn from the unhappy inhabitants of the lower country.

A select force of 1,000 men arrived at Kemmendine on the 1st ultimo from Ava. It was then given out that they had come to relieve the troops then in Rangoon, but it was generally supposed that the warlike chief of Martaban had given great dissatisfaction to the court of Ava, and that he was the object of the expedition.

Should this chieftain oppose force to force, there can be little doubt that the Burmese will soon destroy him. Their army in Pegue is said to be well supplied with muskets and bayonets, which we imagine they must have taken during the war. They have about thirty iron and brass guns at Rangoon, and an immense quantity of swivels and gingals, and they are daily improving in discipline .- Mad. Cour., Dec. 21.

SUBSCRIPTIONS.

The subscriptions for the crews of the ships wrecked during the late storm, amounted, on the 16th Jan., to 12,481 ru-

The subscription for erecting a statue in honour of the late Sir Thomas Munro. amounted, on the same day, to 100,528 rupecs.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals.

Jan. 9. H.M.S. Cyrene, from Penang; and Fort William, Neish, from China and Penang.—11. La Belle Milane, Hunter, from London and Cape of Good Hope; and H.M.S. Hund, Furneaux, from Penang.—13. Lord Medville, Brown, from Calcutta.—15. Cipide, Munro, from Calcutta; and Carusae, Partarriau, from Bordeaux, Bombay, and Ceylon.—16. Chide Harold, West, from Calcutta.

Departures.

Jan. 10. Catherine, Hudson, for Trincomallee.

—11. La Gironde, Caussade, for Aleppe. —17.

Protector, Waugh, for London.

BIRTHS.

Dec. 11. At Quilon, the lady of Lieut. Hope Smith, 15th N.I., of a daughter. 17. At Vellore, the lady of Lieut and Adj. Geo.

17. At Vellore, the lady of Lieut and Adj. Geo. Wright, of a daughter.

31. At Vellore, Mrs. Macleod, lady of Capt. W. Macleod, 35th N.I., of a daughter.

32. At Arnee, the lady of Lieut. J. Smith, 31st or Trichinopoly Li., of a son.

3. At Arnee, the lady of Lieut and Paym. W. Cotton, 10th M.N.I., of a daughter.

7. The lady of T. M. Lane, Esq., of a daughter.

8. At Bangalore, the lady of Maj. Harris, of a daughter.

daughter.

MARRIAGE.

Jan. 9. At St. Mary's Church, Allan Stewart, Esq., Capt. H.M.'s 89th regt., to Rebecca Amelia, daughter of H. N. Watson, Esq., of Charlton House, near Dover, Kent.

DEATHS.

Dec. 20. At Cannanore, Cornella, youngest daughter of Capt. Barbauld, H.M.'s 54th regt.
30. At Ponducherry, Madame Pascale Camus, aged 85.

Jan. 4. Charles Henry, only son of C. H. Ciay,

San, 48 Charles Helly, only son of Criticity, Esq., aged 3 years. 8. Louisa, third daughter of Capt. Paske, of artillery, aged 2 years. 16. The Rev. John Gordon, missionary, aged 49.

Bombay.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

OFFICIATING ASSISTANT SURGEONS.

Bombay Castle, Sept. 1, 1827 .- A considerable number of assistant surgeons on the regular establishment having arrived from Europe in the present season, the Governor in Council is enabled to dispense with the services of the gentlemen who have been temporarily engaged on the Medical Establishment, and he is accordingly pleased to fix the 31st Dec. next as the date from which all officiating assistant surgeons shall cease to be borne on the public establishment,

WIDOWS OF EUROPEAN SOLDIERS.

Bombay Castle, Sept. 11, 1827.—With reference to the G. O. dated 25th Jan. last which prescribes that widows of European soldiers be not excluded from the henefits of Lord Clive's fund on account of their being of Indian birth or parentage, the Honourable the Governor in Council directs that it be understood that widows of unmixed native extraction are not admissable to pensions from that institution.

TEA AND SUGAR TO EUROPEAN TROOPS.

Bombay Castle, Sept. 22, 1827. — The Governor in Council has been pleased to notify, in reference to G. O. of 31st May last, that the rates at which the Commissariat is at present enabled to supply the European proops with tea and sugar will allow the same to be changed to the men at the rate of eighteen reas the ration at Bombay, and nineteen reas at out stations, supposing the daily ration to be fixed at half an ounce of green ten and one ounce and a half of sugar. In case of any fluctuation in the prices of these articles the same will be announced accordingly.

The Governor in Council at the same time notifies that it is optional with commanding officers of regiments to obtain these supplies through the Commissariat or by their own means as heretofore, heing careful, however, to give timely notice to the Commissariat of any intended change in the mode of supply.

OFFICIATING PAYMASTERS.

Bombay Castle, Oct. 20, 1827. -Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct, that on all applications for permission for officers to conduct the pay department of His Majesty's troops, the regimental paymaster of committee of paymastership on whose account such officer is to officiate, transmit with the application a written declaration in duplicate, signed in the one case by the paymaster, or in the other by each of the officers composing the committee, stating that they hold themselves responsible for the acts of the officer who undertakes to perform the duties; and if the permission be granted, a notification to that effect from His Exc. the Commander-in-chief to the office of audit accompanied by the written obligation above-mentioned, will be the military auditor general's authority for recognizing the acting paymaster and passing his allowances.

REGIMENTAL PAYMASTERS.

Bombay Castle, Oct. 31, 1827. — The Hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to announce that the G. O. dated 20th May 1825, which directs that no officer from whom security is required shall be permitted to draw his official allowance until such security be furnished, is not intended to apply to king's regimental paymasters, hut only to officers who receive a specific salary in addition to their pay and allowances.

SALARIES OF DIPUTY JUDGE ADVOCATES

Bombay Castle, Oct. 31, 1827. — The Home the Governor in Council is pleased to publish for the infarmation of the army the following extract of a letter from the Hon. the Court of Directors, dated 25th April, 1827.

[74 and 76. The addition of 75 Rs. per mensem to the salaries of the Deputy Judge Advocates General advised.]

" 32. We see no occasion for augmenting the salaries of the Deputy Judge Advocates at your presidency, which are already higher than those at Madras, and we direct that the additional seventy-five rupees a month be refunded according to the notification made to you in our letter in this department dated 14th July 1815."

COMMISSABIAT ARRANGEMENTS.

Bombay Castle, Nov. 31, 1827. — The Hon, the Governor in Council having resolved to relieve the Commissary General of the details at the presidency office, and to place him precisely on the same footing with the Assistant Commissary General at the presidency as he stands with those at the other stations of the army, is pleased to make the following arrangements in the commissariat department, to have effect from the first proximo.

The first assistant attached to the Surat division to be transferred to the presidency division.

The second assistant attached to the Cutch subsidiary force to be transferred to the Surat division of the army including the Northern districts of Guzerat, comprising the stations of Surat, Broach, Kaira and Ahmedabad.

The third assistant at Rajcote to be attached to the Cutch subsidiary force.

The duties at Rajcote in Kattiwar, which station belongs to the Baroda subsidiary force, to be added to the duties of the second assistant attached to that force.

The Commissary General will lose no time in carrying the above arrangement into effect, reporting to the Military Board when completed.

REQUISITIONS OF CIVIL OFFICERS FOR MILITARY AID.

Bombay Castle, Nov. 24, 1827 .- The following G. O. dated the 16th instant. circulated from the Judicial Department, is now published for the information of all military authorities.

General Order by Government.

Although by Regulation XXII. of 1827, Section xlvi. civil officers at outstations are authorized to make requisitions on the military authorities of the place for military aid, in prosecution of public purposes, among which the preservation of the public peace is included under Regulation XII. of 1827, Section xxxi., Clause 4th, still it is by no means the intention of the Governor in Council that civil officers should have any control over the military establishment beyond that which may be absolutely necessary; with this view, therefore, the following rules have been resolved on by Government.

1st. No civil officer shall make a requisition for troops until he has requested and obtained the sanction of Government for the measure, unless it be apparent that the delay requisite for that purpose will prove detrimental to the public interests, which he will then certify in the requisition, he will also in that case immediately report the requisition to Government.

2d. When a requisition is made without the previous sanction of Government, the officer commanding the division may decline compliance with it, on charging himself with the responsibility.

3d. Requisitions must always be made to the officer commanding the division by the civil officer permanently or temporarily at the head of the department,

4th. When requisitions are made, all the information of the service required to be performed must be given by the civil officer to the commanding officer, who is alone charged with the duty of fixing the force required, and the mode of employing it, for the purpose of performing the service described.

NEW CORPS OF GOLUNDAUZE.

Bombay Castle, Nov. 30, 1827 .- The following extract, paragraphs 2d and 3d, of a letter from the hon. Court of Directors, dated the 10th of April last, is published for the information of the army.

" Para. 2d. We have had before us paras. 67 and 68 of your letter of 19th Sept. 1825 and paras. 16 and 18 of your letter dated 7th June 1826, and being of opinion that a corps of Golundauze is required for the service of your presidency, we authorize you to raise a battalion of Golundauze of eight companies of the following strength :-

1 Colonel or Lieut. Col. Commandant;

1 Lieutenant Colonel; 1 Major;

5 Captains;

10 Lieutenants :

5 2d Lieutenants : 1 Subadar;

2 Jemadars: 6 Havildars;

Per Company,

6 Naiques; 70 Privates:

being the establishment allowed for the corps of Golundauze at Madras.

" 3d. The battalion of Golundauze of six companies raised by you in 1826 will form the basis of the new corps, and the commissions then granted to the Native officers will continue in force; but we positively direct that all promotions or commissions granted to European officers on that occasion be declared null and void. The new commissions and promotions are to bear date from the day on which the formation of the new corps shall be published to the army in G. ()., which date is to correspond with the date of the commissions to be issued to officers of the Bengal establishment under the operation of orders which we have issued to that Government; you will receive due notice from the Governor General in Conncil of the date which they may have fixed."

In conformity to the preceding orders from the hon. Court of Directors, the rank assigned to the Artillery officers who were promoted by the formation of the Golundauge battalion on the 6th of March 1826. is cancelled, and commissions are assigned to the Artillery officers now promoted from the 28th of Sept. last, the date from which the augmentation under the Bengal establishment has had effect,

ATLOWANCES TO EXECUTIVE ENGINEERS.

Bombay Castle, Dec. 17, 1827 .- The hon, the Governor in Council has been pleased in the general department, to prohibit in future the payment of the allowance of Rs. 4 per diem, hitherto made from the civil department to Infantry officers acting as executive engineers for superintending the erection or repairing of civil buildings in addition to the allowance authorized by G. O. of the 29th June 1820, for similar duties in the military department; unless there be a separate executive engineer for each department and such Infantry officer be acting for both.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

James Little, Esq., to be sheriff for ensuing year, in suc. to D. Seton, Esq.

Judicial Department.

Drc. 24. Mr. Gregor Grant to be first senior assist, judge and criminal judge of Surat.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Bombay Castle, Nov. 23, 1827.—1st Gr. N.I. Lieut. J. Harvey to be adj., v. Clibborn prom. to a comp.; dated 19th Oct. 1827.

Now N.I. Lieut. J. D. Browne to be adj., v. Peyton dec, and Lieut. H. Aston to be qu. man and interp. in Hiudoostance and Mahratta languages, v. Browne; both dated 15th Oct. 1887.—Ens. T. Jackson to act as qu. mast. and interp. in Hindoostance during absence of Lieut. Aston, at ses on sick certificate.

sea on sick certificate.

Now, 27.— Temporary Arrangements confirmed.
Lleut. Col. M. Riddiell, 7th Madras L.C., to command its infantry brigade of Dooab field force on departure of Lleut. Col. Frederick to Bombay.—
Lleut. Col. S. Whitchill to assume temporary command of Gulcawar subaid. force, and Maj. Gibbon that of brigade at Baroda, on departure of Lieut. Col. Sandwith to presidency.—Capt. H. Sandwith, 8th N.I., to take charge of departments of assist. add, gen. and assist. qu. mast. gen., Gulcawar subsid. force, during absence of Capt. Roe. Roe.

5th N.J. Ens. W. T. C. Scriven to be lieut., v. Unwin dec.; dated 16th Nov. 1827.

10th N.T. Lieut, D. Liddell to be capt., and Ens-T. Jackson to be lieut., in suc. to Ponget dis-charged the service by sentence of a general court-martial; dated 18th Nov. 1827.

Capt. C. Waddington to be civil engineer at pre-

Lieut, C. W. Grant to be executive engineer at Broach and Kaira.

Licut. T. Turner to be acting executive engineer in Cutch and Kattywar, with allowances of an assistant only until he has passed an examination in native language.

Nov. 29.—8th N.I. Lieut. J. Neville to be capt., and Ens. H. C. Morse to be lieut. in suc. to Newton dec.; dated 18th Nov. 1827.

Lieut. G. J. Mant, 19th N.I., to be a brigade najor to forces, v. Newton dec.; dated 18th Nov.

Lieut. G. St. B. Brown, 7th N.I., to be fort adj. at Surat, v. Mant; dated ditto.

Dec. 1.—Lieut. J. W. Gordon, 7th N.I., placed at disposal of resident of Hyderabad. Cadet Alex. Tweedale admitted to cavalry.— Cadet S. Wyatt admitted to inf., and prom. to Lieut. Athill to be ass'stant to chief engineer, v. Capt. Jervis who resigns that appointment.

Dec. 3.—Temporary appointment. comfirmed. Maj. G. Tweedy, 8th regt., to exercise command of Guicawar subaid. force may devolve upon Lieut. Col. S. Whitehill.—Capt. R. H. Gillum to act as assist. adj. gen. with Guicawar subaid force of Capt. Leighton on sick certificate.—Lieut. R. McKenig, 1st L.C., to act as adj. to right wing at Kaira.—Lieut. H. Stockley to act as qu. mast. to 7th N.I. 7th N.I.

Lieut H. Fawcett, 1st L.C., to act as brigade major on northern districts of Guzerat from date of departure of Capt. Gilium to join Guicawar subsid. force.

Lieut. C. Prescott, 5th N.I., to act as paymaster Baroda subsid. force during absence of Capt. Meldrum.

Dec. 4 .- Ens. T. R. Stewart transf., at his own request, from 10th to8th N.I.

23d N.I. Ens. F. H. Browne to be lieut, v. Ramsay dec.; Lieut. P. T. French to be adj., v. Ramsay dec.; and Lieut. C. H. Browne to be acting qu. mast., v. French; all dated 26th Nov. 1827.

Dec. 5.—Lieut. the Hon. A. O. Murray, 2d L. C., to be an alde-de-camp on personal staff of Com-in-chief, v. Knox, from 1st Dec.

Infantry. Sen. Maj. H. R. Deschamps to be lieut. col., v. Hickes dec.; dated 17th Oct. 1827.—Sen. Maj. T. Morgan to be lieut. col., v. Meall retired; dated 2d Dec. 1827.

7th N.I. Capt. D.Wilson to be maj., Lieut. T. C. Parr to be capt., and Ens. J.R.Hibbert to be lieut., in suc. to Morgan prom.; all dated 2d Dec. 1827.

23d N.I. Capt. M. E. Bagnold to be maj., and Lieut. H. Lyons to be capt., in suc. to Deschamps prom.; dated 17th Oct. 1827.—Ens. T. Stock to be lieut., v. E. P. Hamsay dec.; dated 26th Nov. 1827.

Dec. 8.—Cadets W. A. St. Clair and J. N. Rooke admitted to artillery, and prom. to 2d-lieuts.—Mr. John Ross admitted an assist. surg.—Mr. Edw. Ovens admitted a veterinary surg.

Capt. W. Henderson to be paymaster at presidency, v. Dunsterville app. agent for clothing the army.

Capt. G. Moore to be paymaster in Poona divi-sion of army.

Capt. J. Ranken, 23d N.I., to be paymaster in Surat division of army.

Licut. P. M. Melville, 7th N.I., to be acting aymaster to Surat division of army during Capt. Rankin's absence with his regt.

Dec. 10.-7th N.I. Lieut. T. D. Fallon to be adi. v. Parr prom.; dated 2d Dec. 1827.

8th N.I. Lieut. C. Richards to be adj., v. Neville prom.; dated 18th Nov. 1827.

Dec. 17.—Assist. Surg. D. Fallon to have medical charge of detachment of invalids at Panwell, and to attend all applications for medical assistance from persons in H.M.'s or H.C.'s service passing that station.

from persons in H.M.'s or H.C's service passing that statuon.

Temporary arrangements confirmed. Lieut. Col.

C. Litchfield, 2d L.C., to assume temporary command of Malwa field force on departure of Lieut.

Col. Salter to join Guicowar subsid. force—Lieut.

Col. Salter to foin Guicowar subsid. force—Lieut.

Col. Salter to glind to command in northern districts of Guizorat on departure therefrom of the North of Guizorat on departure therefrom of Lieut.

Col. P. Delamontte proceeding, to presidency on sick certificate—Capit. G. Moor, 18th N.I., to army from 18th Nov., until relieved by officer nominated to the duty.—Lieut. F. Croad, H.M.'s 20th F., to act as brigade major to field detachment of Bombay troops serving with Dooab force—Lieut. W. Wenn to act as adj. of the N.I. from 27th Nov., until Lieut. Shawmay be relieved from hange of regil—Lieut. C. W. Wenn to act as adj. and Lieut. Shawmay he relieved from hange of regil—Lieut. Shawmay be relieved from Landon. 10th N.I., to act as latter,—Lieut. Shawmay he relieved from saylable for the duty.—Lieut. W. Lang on John N.I., to act as latter,—Lieut. Shawmay he relieved from the saylable for the duty.—Lieut. W. Lang on John N.I., to act as latter,—Lieut. C. Lang to 21st N.I. during absence of Lieut. Ennis on duty at Surat.—Lieut. J. T. Forster, qu. maxt. of marine bat., to officiate as interp. to 7th N.I. until further orders.

Dr. 29.—Lieut. D. Dranton. 40th Marine N. I. further orders.

Dr. 29.—Lieut. Durantoy, 49th Madras N.I., to take charge of European and native details at Belgaum; dated 4th Sept.

Surg. Jas. Dow to be garr. surg. of Surat, in suc. to Surg. Paton proceeding on furlough.

Jan. 7, 1828.—Assist. Surg. Forest, H.M.'s 20th regt., to have charge of field detachment hospital at Satara.

at Natara.

Temporary arrangements confirmed. Maj. G. Tweedy, 8th N.I., to assume temporary command of Guicowar subsid. force.—(apt. J. Clerk, 22d. N.I., to command northern districts of Guzerat on departure of Capt. Gillum to join Guicowar subsid. force.—Lieut. F. Durark, 24th N.I., to act as adj. to five native companies of light bat. while proceeding from Doods field force to rejoin Poona div. of army, and Lieut. F. Meddrum, Queen's Royals, to act as qu. mast. to remaining portion of bat. on departure of Lieut. Woodburn, from Lieut. A. Dec. 1827.—Lieut. J. S. Ramsay to act as a qu. mast. to 4th N.I. during absence of Lieut. Thorn-bury on duty at Vingoria.—Lieut. S. I. Stevens to act as adj. to 62th N.I. until arrival of Lieut. Prior.—Lieut. H. C. Tesasdale to act as adj. to details of 22th N.I. left at Sattara, from 14th Dec. 1827.

Returned to duty from Europe. Lieut. C. H. Wella, 26th N.L.; arrived 22d Nov.—Lieut. C. A. Woodheuse, 3d L.C., and Capt. J. Farquharson, 9th L.C.; arrived 4th Dec.

MARINE APPOINTMENTS.

Jan. 4.—Capt. Walker to succeed Capt. Hardy as capt. of Mazagon dock, on his departure for England.—Capt. Grant to take charge of appointment after Capt. Hardy's departure until arrival of Capt. Walker.

FURLOUGHS.

FURLUUGHS.

To Europe.—Nov. 29. Lieut. Col. Brown, for health.—Assist. Surg. A. Turnbull, Madras estab., for health.—Dec. S. Lieut. C. Benbow, 15th N.I., for healt algready at Cape of Good Hope).—17. Capt. S. Long. 9th N.I.—Surg. A. Paton, garr. surg. at Surat.—19. Ens. R. Lewis, 22d N.I., on private affairs.—Jan. 3. Lieut. C. A. Stewart, 16th N.I., for health.—Lieut. For. Drake, 4th N.I., for health.—Capt. W. Thompson, 17th Madras N.I., for health.—Assist. Surg. L. Liddell, for health.—Capt. J. Wildison, invalid bat., for health.—Lieut. Col. S. Whitehill, 3d L.C., for health.—Maj. G. Noble, 21st N.I., for health.

To Cope of Good Hope.—Jan. 2. Lieut. G. Le G. Jacob, 2d Gr. N.I., for twelve months, for health. To Sea.—Nov. 23. Lieut. R. G. King, 3d N.I., for nine months, for health.—Dec. 18. Capt. C. Johnson, 3d N.I., for one year, for health.

To the Neelgherry Hulls.—Nov. 28. Capt. T. Leighton, assist. adj. gen. Gulcowar subsid. force, for six months, for health.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MHOW RACES.

On the last day of the Mhow races, 5th Dec. a "whim purse," as it is called in the Bombay papers, was run for between a bullock and a tattoo, which terminated according to the following official report-

Ragoo's....Dun Bullock.....1
Baggajee's....Tattoo Motee.....2

This race created great amusement, and expectation was on tiptoe to see how it would turn out : - the bullock was in high galloping order, and came to the scratch looking very like a winner. The tattoo was of the true fighting cast, with short hair and long teeth, and his tail in notches. At starting the bullock made a jump for the lead, and by just grazing the tattoo's side with his horn, somewhat accelerated his pace; but the bullock galloped in high style, his tail proving of great assistance to the rider of the tattoo, who knowingly availed himself of it for some yards; then disdaining any further aid, he dropped the bullock's tail, and won by a head.

MR. ELPHINSTONE'S STATUP.

The subscription to the statue of the Hon. Mr. Elphinstone to be erected in Bombay, and to the service of plate to be presented to him in England, amounted on the 12th Jan, to $1,000 rupees.

FFTE AT PARELL HOUSE.

Tuesday last being New Year's Day, the Hon. the Governor entertained the society of this settlement at Parell House. The fête was on the usual scale, but the attendance of ladies was less numerous than on some former occasions. This may be ascribed in a great measure to the absence of many families on little tours, to which the present coolness of the weather and relaxation from business particularly invite them. There was, however, at Government House, a very large assemblage of the gentlemen of the services, the mer-Asiatic Journ. Vot. 25. No. 150.

chants, the bar, &c. The Hon. the Chief Justice, with Lady West, and His Exc. the Commander-in-chief, were likewise present .- Bom. Cour. Jan. 5.

SHIPPING

Arrivals.

Arrivats.

Dec. 13. Gipsev, Quick, from Liverpool; and Seesstris, Bourchier, from London.—15. Helen, Langly, from China.—16. Britannia, Ferris, from London; and Lord Castlereagh, Hogg, from China.—19. John Bannerman, White, from China; and Glossos, Craw, from Bussrah.—20. Duke of Bedfords, Parsons, from Muscat, and Mathina, M'Dermott, from Bushire.—24. L'Eredine, Autjeame, from Bourbon.—25. Earl Kellue, Strik, from Calcutta.—3. Asa Felix, Jellice, from Calcutta.—Jan. 2. Princess of Wales, Bradford, from Calcutta.—3. Anne, Allen, from China.—4. Lougee Family, Lewis, from China.—13. Grecian, Allen, from Bengal.

Departures.

Departures.

Dec. 17. Good Success, Durant, and Hannah, Martin, both for China,—19. American brig Reoper, Chapman, for Musert.—25. Maleina, Murray, for London,—29. Vigenia Camavana, Gor Malabar, Bourbon, and Marseines—Jan. Cabedonia, Whyte, for China.—3. Bark Maleina, M'Dermott, for Madras,—4. Skylnerk, Symes, for Ceylon.—6. Recovery, Chapman, for London.—15. Cumbrian, Blyth, for London,—16. Cumbrian, Blyth, for London.

BIRTHS.

Dec. 3. At Gwalior, the lady of Major Josiah Stewart, political resident, of a daughter.

8. At Rutangherry, the lady of Lieut. McGll-livray, executive engineer of the Southern Concan, of a daughter.

Jan. 3. The lady of Lieut. Moresby, deputy marine storekeeper, of a son.

5. At Maloongha, Mrs. Archer, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Dec. 12. Mr. R. King, to Miss E. Bird. 22. At St. Thomas's Church, Mr. G. B. Smith, head clerk in the adjutant general's office, to Miss E. Tyndall.

Jan. 1. Mr. H. Cressleman, Marshal Bombay Gaol, to Miss C. Johnson.

DEATHS.

Nov. 25. At Assergurth, Lieut. E. P. Ramsay, adj. of the 24d N.I. 27. At Nusverabad, Lieut. J. C. Drummond, 19th Bombay N.I., aged 21, fourth son of Admiral and Lady Charlotte Drummond, of Megginch Castle, Perthshire.

— Drowned off the coast of Bancoote, Mrs. Lewis, wife of R. Lewis, Esq., Bombay N.I.—also their Infant child.

Dec 5. Of Gold.

Dec. 5. Of fever, Mr. James Grant, free mariner, aged 15.

8. Colin Chas. Forbes, third son of Colin Robertson, Esq., of York Place, London, in his 22d year.

Mr. G. Bilton, mechanist, of the new mint, aged 26

9. In the fort, C. J. J. Robertson, F.q., of Cal-

Jan. 5. Catherine, wife of Mr. Conductor H. F. Dilly, of the depôt of instruction at Matoongha, aged 28.

Penang.

DEATHS.

Oct. 14. Herapiet Ter Gabriel, Esq., Armenian merchant of this island, aged 32. 15. Mrs. Heylin, wife of Mr. Henry Heylin,

aged 21.
Nov. 3. Clara Frances, wife of E. T. Downes, Esq., of Kishnagur, assist. surg. of the H.C.'s service.

5 P

Singapore.

SEIZURE OF THE CARIMONS.

A considerable sensation appears to nave been excited here by the proceedings of the Rajah Muda of Rhio, who, in conjunction with the Dutch Resident of that settlement, but ostensibly on his own account, has taken forcible possession of the Carimons, by an armament, in which was an European detatchment, under the compand of Major Elout, the said resident.

MARRIAGE.

Oct. 9. John Patullo, Esq., of the civil service, to Harriet, eldest daughter of Dr. Jas. Hare, late of Calcutta.

Malacca.

On the 1st Nov. a meeting of the principal inhabitants of this settlement was held at the Court House, to take into consideration the Governor's communication that the existence of the Orphan Chamber is in opposition to that clause of the charter of justice, which provides for the administration to the estates of persons dying intestate. It appeared that its dissolution would be attended with ruinous consequences to the inhabitants, and that to call in the bonds held under the Chamber for money lent out, would be attended with much delay and trouble, or with utter ruin to many industrious Independent of this, the individuals. great utility of the Chamber was brought to view, by which it appeared that the Chamber served as a sort of bank to the inhabitants in general; that the surplus money of the Chamber, (until the late plundering of it by the Dutch government) had been applied to useful public purposes, viz. supporting the Protestant and Roman Catholic clergy; feeding the poor; repairing the roads; supporting schools, &c.; and that the surplus fund might again be applied to similar purposes when it became any way sufficient. Upon such and other grounds it was unanimously resolved that a committee be appointed to draw up a petition to the Governor, to interfere in behalf of the Chamber, to have it formed into a body politic, independent of the Court, with the same privileges as hitherto enjoyed, but under certain alterations and regulations which would tend to its improvement.

== China.

DEATHS.

Dec. 23. At Macao, Sir Wm. Fraser, Bart., president of the Select Committee of the Hon. East-India Company's establishment at Ganton.

Lately. J. G. Ellis, Esq., of the Bengal military service, in his 20th year, fourth son of the late Colonel Ellis, 25th Dragoons.

Aetherlands India.

STATE OF JA

Batavian papers and letters to the beginning of January, contain abundant proofs that the insurrection is rather extended than diminished; although some of the Pangerangs land submitted, Diepo Negoro is at the head of a considerable force, and moves about with little molestation from the Dutch troops. The reinforcements from the Netherlands had not arrived.

The old Sultan of Djocjokarta, who was restored by the Netherlands Government in 1826, died on the 2d of January. In consequence of his decease, the young Sultan has been placed under the guardianship of Pangerang Mangko Kosoemo.

DUTIES AND COMMERCIAL REGULATIONS.

Amsterdam, April 22.—The king of the Netherlands has declared the port of Rhio to be a free port after the 1st of January 1829, for the importation and exportation of all goods, free from tolks, duties, &c. They are to be declared under the form of a bill of lading, excepting only munitions of war, which are to be left at the disposal of the Dutch governor and council of the port Brussels, May 17.—By a decree of his Majesty, dated April 25, the export dutice on coffee in our East-India possessions will be henceforth levied as follows.—Exported by national ships from the Netherlands, 2 florins per picol; by national ships from foreign ports, 2 florins 50 c.nts. per picol. By foreign ships for ports of the Netherlands, 4 florins per pect; by foreign ships for foreign ports, 5 florins.

These regulations are to take effect in the several ports of our East-India colonies 15 days after their publication. Foreign vessels clearing out for one of the ports of the Netherlands are to pay, besides the duty of 4 florins, the surplus of one florin per picol, which surplus will be repaid as soon as the cargo is discharged in one of the ports of the Netherlands.

DEATH.

Oct. 2. At Batavia, Gavorke Manuk, Esq., an Armenian merchant of that place, aged 60.

Australasia.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

BIRTHS.

Sept. 12. At Sydney, the lady of the Rev. Dr. Halloran, of a daughter.
28. At Dobroid, the lady of D. Ramsay, Esq., of a daughter.
Oct. 8. At Sydney, Mrs. Duncomb, of a son.
23. At

23. At Minchinbury, the wife of H. Howey, Esq., of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

MARKIAGES,
Sept. 20. At Sydney, Miss Stephen, daughter of the Hon. Mr. Justice Stephen, to Capt. Robison, of the New South Wales Corps.
29. In Suttone Test, district of Argyle, James Atkinson, Esq., J. P. of Oldburn, to Miss C.
Waring,
Oct. 1. At Sydney, W. Shairp, Esq., clerk in the Colonial Office, and son of Maj. Shairp, h. p. 29th Foot, to Sophia, eldest daughter of Mr. Jas. Milsom, North Shore
6 At Sydney, W. John Paul to Miss Merc.
6 At Sydney, Mr. John Paul 6. At Sydney, Mr. John Paul, to Miss Mary

Bowen.

16. At Sydney, Mr. Badgery, of the South Creek, to Miss Dixon, niece of John Dixon, Esq., of the steam-engine, Sydney.

DEATHS.

Aug. 22. At Sydney, Mr. John Nobbs, of Upper Pitt Street.

Lately. Mr. Pennington, formerly superinten-dent of the establishment at Port Stephens.

Mauritius.

RIRTHE.

Sept. 18. The lady of W. S. Saunders, Esq., of Sept. 18. 1 ne rany of the state of Capt. H. W. Oct. 20. At Bourbon, the wife of Capt. H. W. Beyts, of the grab bark Shah Byramgore, of a daughter.

Cape of Good Wove.

Dec. 17. At Graham's Town, J. M. Cameron, Esq., Capt. in H.M.'s 55th Foot, aged 42.

INDIAN SECURITIES AND EXCHANGES.

Calcutta, Jan. 11, 1828.

Guerann, Jan. 11, 1828.

Buy, I Rs. As.

Buy, I Rs. As.

Prem. 26 0° Henlitable Loan 6 per ct. 25 3 Prem.

Disc. 0 3 Five per ct. Loan . 0 6 Disc.

Prem. 0 3 New per cent. Loan . Pan Disc.

Rates of Exchange.

On London, 6 months' sight,—to buy 1s. 10′_d.

—to sell 2s. 9/d, per *stea Rupec.

On Madras, 30 days' ditto, 91 to 92 Sicca Rupees per 100 Madras Rupees.

per 100 Madras Rupees. On Bombay ditto, 98 Sicia Rupees per 100 Bombay Rupees.
Bank Shares.—Prem.—to buy 5,200—to sell 5,100.

Madras, Jan 16, 1228.

Government Securities.
Six per cent, Bengal Remittable Loan.
At the Rate of Subscription, viz. 350
Matras Rs. per 335 Sa. Rs.
At a Rate prevailing among Merchants and Brokers in buying and selling Public Securities, viz. 106, Madras Rs. per 100 Sa. Rs. 287 Prem. 100 Sa. Rs. 26) Prem.

Five per cent. Bengal Unremittable Loan. At the Rate of Subscription, viz. 350 Madras Rs. per 335 Sa. Rs. At the Rate prevailing among Merch. 18 and Brokers in buying and selling Pub-lic Securities, viz. 106; Madras Rs. per 100 Sa. Rs. 1 Dies 100 Sa. Rs. 1 Disc.

Bombay, Jan. 12, 1828.

A Five per cent. Loan open. Exchange.

On London, at 6 months' sight, 1s. 83d, per Rupce. On Calcutta, at 30 days' sight, 100 Bom. Rs. per 100 Sicca Rupees.

On Madras, at 30 days' sight, 100 Bom. Rs. per 100 Madras Rs.

Canton, Dec. 4, 1827.

Exchange on England, six months, 4s. to 4s. 2d. Ditto on Bengal, 30 days, 200 to 202. Ditto on Bombay, 30 days, 210 to 213. Sysee Silver, prem. per cent. 5s. 2d.

DEBATE AT THE EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

East-India House, 28th May, 1828.

A Special General Court of Proprietors of East-India Stock was held for the purpose of laying before the proprietors, for their approbation, a resolution of the Court of Directors of the 2d of April last, granting to Major George Cunninghame, of the Bengal retired list, an allowance of 2001, per annum, in addition to his present pay and allowance of 130l. per annum, on the grounds therein

(Owing to the late period of the month, we must reserve a full report of the debate for our next number.)

The Chairman (W. Astell, Esq.) having stated the purpose for which the Court had been summoned, the resolution of the Court of Directors was read, from which it anneared that in 1816. Major /then (aptain) Cunninghame had greatly signalized himself in quelling a dangerous mutiny at Barcilly. In the course of an action with the insurgents, his horse was shot under him, and he fell on the hilt of his sword, by which he was severely wounded. He then proceeded to sea, for the benefit of his health, and returned to India in 1818; but his health still continning in a bad state, he was obliged again to go to sea. In 1819 he arrived in England, and in 1822 he represented to the Court of Directors the state of bodily suffering under which he laboured, and alluded also to the fact that he had lost his private property by the failure of a house of agency. In January, 1823, he was permitted to retire on his half-pay of 1731, 7s. 6d. per annum. A pension of 100l. was subsequently granted to him; and an addition of 301, was afterwards made to that pension. The Court of Directors now recommend an additional pension of 2001, per annum, on the grounds of the important services rendered by Major Cunninghame at Bareilly, in 1816, and the injury which he had received at that critical period, by which his health had been greatly impaired.

The Chairman then moved, " That the Court approve of the said resolution, subject to the confirmation of another General Court."

After a few remarks by Captain Maxfield, Mr. Trant, Mr. Rigby, Mr. Gaha-gan, and General Thornton, the resolution was agreed to.

The Chairman then informed the Court, that it was made further special, for the purpose of laying before the proprietors the draught of a bill now before Parliament, entitled, " A bill to consolidate and amend several acts for the further improvement of the port of London, by making docks and other works at Blackwall, for the accommodation of East-India shipping.

In answer to a question by Mr. Rigby. The Chairman said, that this bill was brought in by the East-India Dock Company, in consequence of the compulsory clauses in the old bill having expired. By these clauses the Company were bound for a certain number of years to send their ships to the East-India docks, but that obligation being at an end, they might now send their ships where they pleased, with the exception of their large China ships, which could go no where else, the gates of the other docks not being sufficiently large to admit them.

Mr. Gahagan made some observations in regard to certain papers relative to the insolvency of Mr. Ricketts of Madras.

CAPTAIN PRESCOTT'S CASE.

The Chairman acquainted the Court, that the Court of Directors had felt it to be their duty, in reference to the proceedings which had taken place in the Court of King's Bench against certain parties, to lay before the proprietors the whole of the papers relative to the case of Mr. E. D. Bach, and also to the case of Cadet Bailey, of the Madras service, who had been recalled, as his appointment appeared to have been improperly obtained.

Captain Prescott said, he had only to request that the proprietors would examine those papers; and if they found any cause to blame his conduct, he did not wish to cloak himself from their censure, because he sat behind the bar. (Hear!) He had been, in the first place, tried by a jury of his country, and honourably acquitted; but unless his acquittal came also from the proprietors, he did not wish to keep his seat. (Hear!)

A conversation ensued, in which the Hon. H. Lindsay, Capt. Prescott, and Mr. Carruthers took part; after which,

The Hon, H. Lindsay moved that all the papers which had been laid before the Court, on the subject of the case of Mr. J. D. Bach, and of Cadet Bailey, be printed for the use of the proprietors.

The motion, which was seconded by Captain Prescott, was agreed to, and the Court adjourned.

HOME INTELLIGENCE.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 16.

Real Property in India .- Mr. Fergusson brought in a bill to explain and amend the law respecting real property belonging to British subjects and others within the jurisdiction of his Majesty's Courts in India, and the liability of such property as assets (in the hands of executors and administrators) to the payment of the debts of deceased persons; which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on the 2d June.

May 22.

Trial by Jury in India .- Mr. Hume presented a petition from the Native Parsees, Hindoos, and Mahomedans, at Bombay, expressing their gratitude for the bill which two years ago gave them the right to sit on juries; but lamenting that the will cast a stigma on them, by enacting that they should be excluded from grand juries and from all juries by which Christians were to be tried for capital offences. The clause which enacted this had been passed against his (Mr. Hume's) wishes, and against the wishes of many persons of authority who possessed local knowledge of India, and were acquainted with Indian affairs. He did hope that the disabilities complained of by the petitioners would be removed, both in justice to those whom they affected, as well as with a view to raising the native population in the scale of moral and social excellence.

Lord Ashley did not oppose the prayer of the petitioners. The president of the Board of Control wished to proceed in such measures cautiously and with deliberation. The grievance complained of was certainly greater at Bombay than at any other place.

Mr. Trant supported the petition, and bore testimony to the high moral character of the sects to which the petitioners belonged.

The petition was ordered to be printed. At a subequent period of the evening. Mr. Hume med for a copy of the regulations that have been adopted by the Supreme Courts, at the several presidencies in India, as to natives serving on juries, under the 7th of Geo. IV. cap. 37. He prefaced his motion by repeating most of the observations he made on presenting the abovementioned petition. He also read a passage from the presentment of the grand jury of Calcutta in September last, pointing out the evils resulting from the exclusion of the natives from grand juries, for which they were adequately fitted by their respectability and acquirements. The Hon. Gentleman urged the importance of an early attention on the part of government to this subject, and repeated his wish that juries were introduced into India in civil cases. He was sorry to learn that the present Chief Justice of Calcutta did not receive all that attention and approbation which should belong to his station. There was, he understood, a great variance exist-ing between the Chief Justice and the inhabitants, for many reasons. It might be possible, he thought, that the damages in civil cases would be better assessed by a jury, as so much success had attended their introduction in criminal cases.

Lord Ashley declined entering into the discussion of the question opened by Mr. Hume. The only regulation yet received were those adopted by the Supreme Court of Bengal. They were now waiting to be laid before his Majesty, as they would not be put in force till they were returned with the approbation of the king in council.

Mr. T. P. Courtenay said that the capacity to serve did not imply the right to be summoned.

Mr. C. W. Wynn acknowledged that he had at one time considered it desirable that the natives should be allowed to serve on grand juries; but he had altered his opinion when he reflected what very different ideas prevailed among them—for example, as to the rights of a master over his servants. He thought it would be more advisable to let the experiment take its course for allowing them to serve on petit juries. It would be easier and safer to extend the privilege hereafter, than to risk it entirely without experience.

Mr. Fergusson vouched for the honor of the natives, who were perfectly worthy of being intrusted with the functions of grand jurors.

The motion was then agreed to.

Insolvents in India.—Mr. Wynn gave notice, that on the 3d of June he would move for leave to bring in a bill to extend

At a subsequent part of the evening. Mr. Hume moved for a return of the number of persons confined for debt in the different gaols of the several presidencies of India, in the years 1826 and 1827, or in either; together with a statement of the number of years each debtor has been in confinement, the amount of the debt for which he is confined, and whether at the suit of government or an individual. The hon, member entered into a long detail respecting the hardships suffered by debtors in India, and complained that the late President of the Board of Control had not yet brought forward any measure for their relief.

Mr. Wynn was suprised that the hon, gentleman had not heard him give notice of his intention to move for leave to bring in a bill on this very subject. The measure had been delayed some time by the successive deaths of the two last Chief Justices of Calcutta. He assured the house that no exertions had been wanting on his part. When the bill was before the house, it would be seen that it would give relief to a considerable extent.

Mr. Hume had not heard the notice. He was anxious for the returns notwithstanding, in order that the house might know the extent of the evil.

Mr. Fergusson recommended his hon. friend to withdraw his motion, and leave the matter in the hands of government.

Mr. Stewart recommended the hon. member, on the contrary, to persist in it. Four or five years ago, he was one of a deputation appointed to examine the gaol of Calcutta. They were accompanied by the Chief Justice. The scene of misery they beheld surpassed every power of description. There were upwards of 120 persons confined, many of whom had been there more than fourteen years, and for debts not exceeding twelve shillings sterling. He trusted the returns would be produced. They ought to have been on the table of the house long before now, if the authorities in India had done their duty; and if they did not attend to the instructions sent from this country, they ought to be made to do it. As to the extension of the bankrupt laws, he would appeal to the right hon, and learned gentleman (Sir J. Mackintosh), who had sat on the bench of Bombay, whether there was not an immense waste of property in the estates of those who died insolvent, or became so during their life.

nifest injustice cusued from the scrambles which took place on occasions of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the great houses of trade. He had felt very painfully that widows and orphans-those who were absent, and those who were utterly defenceless-were generally deprived of all chance of receiving their proportion of the estate; while those who were on the spot, and shewed that vigilance, for which he did not blame them, which naturally belonged to persons engaged in commerce, were alone able to take care of their own interests. The consequence was, that rain and distress fell on those who deserved it the least, and on whom it operated the most severely. He would not pretend to give an answer to the question put by the right hon, gentleman, without much more reflection than he could then bestow on it: but as to the fact, he would not hesitate to say that the existing system of law was a great evil. There was a want of equity in the distribution of the effects of the insolvent, to which he could himself bear witness.

The motion was then agreed to.

Expenses of the Courts in India .- Mr. Hume then moved for an account of the sums authorized to be received by the officers of the Supreme Courts of Fort William, Fort St. George, Bombay, and Prince of Wales's Island, in the form of an average for the last two or three years, distinguishing the amount of salaries from that of fees. The Hon. Member referred to the representation made by the grand jury of Calcutta on the subject of the fees in the Supreme Court, and to the address of the Chief Justice; and he animadverted upon the exorbitancy of the fees received by some of the officers of the court, which made their receipts, he believed, greater than those of the judges. As these personages had declined interfering, thought that this government should interfere.

Lord Ashley said that the courts of India only announced from time to time such variation in fees as were agreed upon; and, consequently, there would be great difficulty in meeting the Hon. Gentleman's motion from the documents that were in this country.

Mr. Fergusson could not agree with the Hon. Gentleman, because, so far from there being any increase in the rate of fees during the last 27 years, they had, in many instances, diminished. (Hear, hear!) He, therefore, thought that the grand jury had not had so much right to complain as the Hon. Member for Aberdeen seemed to have supposed. It might, perhaps, be the case that officers received more than they did formerly; but this arose from an increase in the business of the court, and not from any additional charge that was made on that business. (Hear, hear !)

Mr. Hume observed, that he did not see why, the business of the courts having increased, the officers should be entitled to an increase of salary in consequence, which had never been calculated upon in the first

Mr. Trant thought that the subject was an important one, and perfectly agreed in the propriety of the Hon. Gentleman's motion.

The motion was then agreed to.

PROMOTIONS AND CHANGES IN THE BRITISH ARMY.

(SERVING IN THE EASI.)

3d. Foot. Serj. G. Edwards, to be qu. mast., v. Coulson, dec. (25 Oct. 27.)

Coulson, dec. (25 Oct. 27.)
(36) Foot. Leut. T. Holyoake, to be capt. by purch., v. Irwin, who rets. (17 Apr. 28); Capt. J. Dawson, from h. p. 3d. Gar. Bat.; to be capt., v. Cheape, app. to 96th F. (24 Apr.); Ens. W. Johnson to be lieut. by punch, v. Holyoake (17 Apr.). J. B. Home, to be ens., by purch., v. Johnson (17 Apr.)

18th Foot. Maj. A. G. Campbell, from h. p., to be capt., v. M. Ross, who exch., rcc. dif. (24 Apr.) 20th Foot. Ens. F. Horn, to be lieut. by purch., v. O'Connor, who rets.; G. Hutchinson, to be ens. by purch., v. Horn (both 17 Apr.)

26th Foot. R. Chearnley, to be ens. by purch., v. Bathe, prom. in 30th F. (24 Apr.)

30th Foot. Light to be capt by purch, v. Powell, pron. (17 Apr.); Ens. J. W. Bathe, from 26th F., to be heut, by purch, v. Light (24 Apr.)

31st Foot. Lieut. C. A Vallancy, from 74th F., to be lieut., v. Binney, who exch. (24 Apr.) 43th Foot. Capt. W. J. St. John, from h. p. Cape corps ex. to be capt., v. A. G. Parker, who exch. (24 Apr.)

1. Dr. to be an in the large of the large of Coplon Roy. Lout. R. Jederson, to be adj., v. Rogers, from (10 Dec. 27.)

INDIA SHIPPING. Arreals.

INDIA SIHPPING.

Arreals.

April 28. Wavertree, Short, from Balavia and Singapore (for Antwerp); at Dartmouth—27.

Buckinghambire, Glasspool, from China 16th Dec.; at Deal.—Duke of Jancaster, Hanney, from Bengal 22d Dec.; at Liverpool.—28. Margeret, McCormick, from Cape of Good Hope 3d.

Jan.; at Gravesend.—30. Minerea, Probyn, from Bengal, 18th Jan. (with treasure); off the Wight.

—Nautilus, Nash, from China 27th Dec. (for Rotterdam); at Cowes.—May 1. Lody Ruseen, Russell, from Ceylon 3d Jan., and Cape of Good Hope 22d Feb.; off Portsmouth.—Therews, Shertiff, from Bengal 13th Dec.; at Liverpool.—40.

More 22d Feb.; off Portsmouth.—Therews, Shertiff, from Bengal 24th Dec.; at Liverpool.—40.

More 22d Feb.; off Portsmouth.—Therews, Shertiff, from Bengal 24th Dec.; at Deal.—Multin, Murray, from Bengal 24th Dec.; at Deal.—Multina, Murray, from Bengal 24th Dec.; at Deal.—Cambrin, Blyth, from Bengal 24th Dec.; at Deal.—Cumbrin, Blyth, from Bengal 24th Dec.; at Deal.—Cumbrin, Blyth, from Bengal 24th Dec.; at Deal.—Cumbrin, Blyth, from Bengal, Mincon Bombay 16th Jan.; at Cowes.—Theoder, Mulgrens, Turner, from the Maurillus, 19th Jan.; at Gravesnd.—Luna, Knox, from Cape of Good Hope 20th Pec.; at Deal.—Luna, Knox, from Cape of Multina, at Cape of Good Hope 2th Dec.; at Deal.—Lody M. Magner, Bowen, from Bengal 19th Jan., at Cape of Good Hope 8th March; at Deal.—12. Royal George, Reynolds, from from Bengal 15th Dec.; off Weymouth.—13. Ann, Sly, from the Mauritius 7th Feb.; at Deal.—21. St. Dauds, Richardson, from Bombay 15th Jan.; off Plymouth.—Farquharon, Crulckshank, from China 15th Jan.; off Plymouth.—Stmpson, Black, from the Mauritius 6th Feb.; at Greenock.—25. Joseph, Christopherson, from Bengal 31st Dec.; at Gravesend.—27. Perstan, Plunkett, from V. D. Land 4th Jan.; off Portsmouth.—Governor Ready, Young, from the Mauritius 30th Jan., and Cape of Good Hope 5th March; off Partsmouth.

Young, from the Mauritius 30th Jun, and Cape of Good Hope 5th March; off Partsmouth.

Departures.

April 25. Chatham, Bragg, for Bombay; from Liverpool.—24. Canning, Baylis, for China; from Deal.—Endoin, Smith, for China; from Deal.—Endoin, Smith, for China; from Deal.—Eliza Jane, Liddell, for Cape of Good Hope; from Deal.—Ediza Jane, Liddell, for Cape of Good Hope; from Peal.—Eliza Jane, Liddell, for Cape of Good Hope; from Portsmouth.—Bolwar, Small, for Bombay; from Portsmouth.—Bolwar, Small, for Mauritius; from Deal.—30. Mary, Dobson, for Bengal; from Portsmouth.—Bolwar, Small, for Mauritius; from Deal.—30. Mary, Dobson, for Bengal; from Greenock.—Cowmet, Daliel, for V. D. Land and N. S. Wales, from Cove of Cok.—May 2, Isabelta, Parker, for Bordeaux and Bengal; from Bengal.—S. Pomona, Highat, for Bombay; from Liverpool.—4. Sauey Jack, Hupenstall, for Bengal; from Plymouth.—5. Augusta, Glass, for China; from Plal.—Countess of Horvoort, Elstison, for N. S. Wales (with convict) for Deal.—How Bengal; from Bengal.—Gowns, Bard, for Hombay; from Greenock.—Chiegram, Blatt, for Bombay; from Greenock.—Chiegram, Blatt, for Bombay; from Liverpool.—1. Dortus Hunter, for Ceylon and Bengal; from Plymouth.—S. Augusta, Blatt, for Bombay; from Leither, for Ceylon; from Bengal.—Gowns, Bard, for Bunthy; from Leither, Cox.—Chiegram, Blatt, for Bombay; from Leither, for Ceylon; from Bengal.—Gowns, Bardson, for Bunthy; from Leither, Sauey, Andrew, for V. D. Land and N. S. Wales; from Deal.—Chiegram, Wales, from Beal.—Chiegram, Whiten, for Gower Coxta and N. S. Wales; from Deal.—How, Maryus, for Madras and Bengal; from Deal.—Prince Rep. Howner, for Madras and Bengal; from Deal.—Brane, Whiten, Howner, Gown Markas and Bengal; from Deal.—Brane, Wales, for Bengal; from Deal.—Rowe, Marquis, for Madras and Bengal; from Deal.—Brane, Wales, for Madras and Bengal; from Deal.—Rowe, Marquis, for Medras and Bengal; from Deal.—Brane, Wilson, for Bengal; from Portsmouth.—Isabelta, Leeds, for China; from Portsmouth.—Isabelta, Leeds, for Madras an

PASSENGERS FROM INDIA.

PASSENGERS FROM INDIA.

Per Wavertree, from Batavia: Mr. Jas. Lowry; Lleut. M'Dowell, Bombay marine.

Per Minerea, from Bengal: Mrs. Warde; Mrs.
Fane; Mrs. Bird; Mrs. Becher; Mrs. Curcton;
Geo. Warde, Esq., H.C. service; Lieut.Col. Bird,
Bengal N.I.; Lieut.Col. Birden, Juh Bengal L.C.;
Cayt. Buckley, 5th ditto; Capt. Cureton, H.M.
I6th Lancers; R. D. Manjes, Ksq., (vill service;
Wm. Peters, Esq., merchant; Mr. R. W. Walters, H.C. marine; Mr. T. Jynh.—Children;
Misses Bird, Becher; Cureton, Garden, two Fane,
two Roberts, Tilghman, Begbie, and Beeby;
Masters Collier, Vibart, Shaw, Clarke; two Warde, and two Cureton; several servants; 54 Invalids.

Per Washington, from China: Mr. D. S. Lyons, of Baltimore.

of Baltimore. Per Nautilus, from China: Mr. Just, watch-maker.

maker.

Per Lady Rowena, from Ceylon: Capt. Geo.
Stewart; Mrs. Stewart; J. G. Forbes, Esq., civil service; Miss Tranchell; Capt. Vaughan, Royal Artillery; Capt. Warde, Engineers, and family;
Capt. Tranchell, 1st Ceylon Regt., and family;

Rev. Mr. Sutherland, Wesleyan Missionary; Miss Sutherland; Maj. Bourchler, Royal Artillery; Lieut. Dillon, Royal Staff Corps; Mrs. Andrews; 10 invalids.

Per Kellie Custle, from China: Capt. Thos. Leech, from St. Helcna; Mrs. Leech, and five children; Mr. Purvis.

The Servanian Company of the Market M invalids; seven native servants.

Per Cambridge, from Batavia: Mr. Donovan, merch.uit.

merchaut.

Per Kingston, from Bengal; Mis-Barclay, J. Fallowfield, varg.con Bengal estab; J. Castell, Fsq., ditto; J. Ogdyk, Fsq., civil service; Capt. Ogdby, King's Royals; Leut. D. Ogdby, Bengal N. L.; Capt. J. Bert by, Bengal axv.; J. O. Owen, Fsq.; T. D. Bambrudge, Esq.; twelve children; filterative Sexy. Met. five native servants.

five native servants.

Per Ludy Mic Voghton, from Bengal; J. W. Wybanth, Evq.; Mrs. Moj. Wrottesley; Mrs. Stinforth; Msses Stewart, and Warlow; the Msses Wrottesley; two Misses Stainforth; two Misses Fraser; Rev. W. Fraser; Capt. Stainforth, cavalty; C. Goddard, Esq.; Masters J. Stainforth, R. Fraser, and E. Bradford; six servents.

Per Farquharson, from China: Capt. W. Allen, of the late ship Ana.

Per St. David, from Bombay: Licut. Iggleside, H.C. marine: Ens. Gray. H.M. 41st regt.; Mr. and Mrs. Gautin and child.

PASSENGERS TO INDIA

PASSENGERS TO INDIA

Per Rose, for Madras and Bengal: Mrs. B.
Wheeler; Mr. R. M. Thomas, attorney; Mrs.
Thomas and four daughters; Messrs. C. Innis and T. Griffin, free merchanits; Mr. E. W. Eyre, asalst.
surg., Madras; Mrs. Pointon; Miss Jane Bald;
Mss. L. B. Barlow; Miss M. Smilmore; Messrs.
G. Crutckshank, J. Sanderson, H. Kenny, W.
Tollemashe, and J. M'Uonald, cadets; Lleut.
Col. Oglander Capt. Brenhant, Lleut. Guthrle, Ens. Strong, Ens. Perse, Ens. Shelly, Ens. Pitzgerald, Paymast. Whitty, Surg. Preston, and
Add. Pointon, all of H.M. 26th foot; Lleut. Mackenzie, of H.M. Itoyal Regt.; 210 soldiers H.M.
26th regt.; 25 soldiers' wives; 29 children of ditto;
several servants. several servants.

Per Prince Regent, for Madras and Bengal: Mrs. C. Morlee; Miss F. Maclean and Miss C. Maclean; Miss II. Macleod, returning; Miss F. Austin;

Miss A. Carthew; Mrs. Pratt, wife of Capt. Pratt; Ms]. Spry. returning; Mrs. Spry; Miss. Mrs. Spry; Miss. Spry; Miss. Mrs. Spry; Mrs. Mrs. Spry; Mrs. Spry; or cutto.

Per Allas, for Madras and Bengal: Capt. Bury;
Mr. and Mrs. Staggar; Mr. Watson; Mr. Christmas; Mr. Goddard; Mr. Ford; Capt. Clayhill;
Mrs. Clayhill.

Per Company of the Allah Stage Company of the Company o per Canning, for China: The Rev. G. H. Va-chell, chaplain; Mr. Jas. Bannerman; Mr. J. F. N. Daniel; Mrs. Daniel and daughter; Mr. W. Baynes; Mrs. Baynes, and two children; five chell, chaplain; Mr. Das Bannerman; Mr. J. F.

N. Daniel; Mrs. Daniel and daughter; Mr. W.
Baynes; Mrs. Baynes, and two children; five servants.

Per Asia, for Bengal; Mrs. Col. Thompson;
Mrs. Abbott; Mrs. Fitzgerald;
Mrs. Thompson; Mrs. Abbott; Mrs. Fitzgerald;
Mrs. Homming; Miss J. Turnbull; Miss M.
Thompson; Mr. Stewart Paxton; Mr. John Hunter, junion merchant; Mr. C. Garbett, assist, uurg.; Messra. C. F. Wake, W. J. Parker, and
D. C. Campbell, cadets; Messra, G. Kelly and N.
Wauge, free mariners; Master C. Abbott; Lieut.
Bonham, H. M. 16th. Lancers; Lieut. Col.,
Campbell, Capt. G. Hogarth; Capt. Eleut. O. K.
Campbell, Capt. G. Hogarth; Capt. Eleut. J. C.
Hemming, all of H. M. 16th weight of the Mrs. Moore; Capt. H.
Hemming, all of H. M. 16th weight of the Mrs. Moore; Capt. H.
Moore, H. M. 46th rettlery; Mrs. Delafosse; Miss Delafosse; Mr. Her Madras Mrs. Moore; Capt. H.
Delafosse, Hengal at Ellery; Mrs. Delafosse; Miss Delafosse; Mr. Her Madras N. I.; Mrs. Walter;
Miss Walters was everal servants.

Per Maloham, Gradier Servants.

Per Miss Eliza Elvi, Gradier Servants.

H. Repton, writers; Messrs, J. K. Poud. C. E.

H. Repton, writers; Messrs, J. K. Poud. C. E.

H. Repton, writers; Messrs, J. K. Poud. C. E.

H. Repton, writers; Messrs, J. K. Poud. C. E.

Per Juliana, E Fly Kuller, Hard, vall of H. M.

Schi regt.; detachment of H. M. 46th regt.; solders wives, &c.

Per Juliana, E Fly Kuller, Hard, vall of H. M.

Schi regt.; detachment of H. M. 46th regt.; solders wives, &c.

Per Juliana, E Fly Kuller, Hard, vall of H. M.

Schi regt.; detachment of H. M. 46th regt.; solders wives, &c.

Per Juliana, E Fly Kuller, Harderson, J. H.

Schi regt.; detachment of vanus.

Per Charles Kerr, for Bombay: Dr. Kemball;
Mr. Henderson; Capt. Billimore; Mr. C. Baker;
Mr. Brailer; Mr. Berdin; Mrs. Kemball;
Misses Shaw, Pollikon, Smith, E. Holmes, and
Misses Shaw, Pollikon, Smith, E. Holmes, and
Misses Shaw, Pollikon, Smith, E. Holmes, and
Freeman, H. Gr. Madras and Bengal; Lieut.
Per Saucy Jack, for Bengal; Mr. Hughes.
Per Isabella, for Madras: Lieut. Cates, H. M.
50th regt.; Mrs. Cates.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

BIRTHS.

March 18. At sea, on board the Minerva, on the passage from Bengal, the lady of Win. Faue, Eq., Hon. E. I. Company's civil service, of a daughter. April 22. At Halgarvic, the lady of Lieux. Col. Webster, Hon. Company's service, of a daughter. 27. At Marshgate Cottage, Richmond, the lady of R. N. Matthews, Eq., lately of Buxar, in the East-Indies, of a daughter.

May 4. At St. Omers, the lady of Capt. Cillford, the Hon. Company's sinp Lady Melville, of a son, 10. At the Royal Milltary College, Sandhurst, the lady of Lieux. Godwin, 40th regt., of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

April 21. At Liverpool, the Rev. T. T. Thomson, M.A., late of Calcutta, to Dorothy, only daughter of the late Mr. R. Dickinson, of Kendal. 22. At Tynemouth Church, Alex. Watt, Esq., of the Bengal civil service, to Susanna, daughter of S. Kelso, Esq., of Preston.

May 8. At Sacher Regis, Devon, the Rev. Henry Dwelley Ryder, cldest son of the Bishop of Lichtfeld and Coventry, and nephew to the Earl of Harrowly, to Cornella Sarah, youngest daughter of George Cornish, Esq., of Salcombe Hill, in the same county.

of Harrowhy, to Cornelia Sarah, youngest daughter of George Cornish, Esq., of Salcombe Hill, in the same country. Wison, of the Bombay marine, the same country. Wison, of the Bombay marine, the same country. Wison, of the Bombay marine, the same country of the Bombay marine, the same country of the Bombay and the same country of Dublin, to Isabella Stuart, cldest daughter of J. A. Andrew, Esq., late surgeon of the Hon. E. I. Company, Sad, late surgeon of the Hon. E. I. Company, Madrias establishment.

15. At St. Mary's, Bryanstone Square, John Smith, Esq., Capl. in the Madras Cavally, to Maria, daughter of J. St. Lockhart, Esq., and grand-daughter of the late D. Cove, Esq., of Opper-Seymour Street.

20. At St. George Hanover Square, Charles Lloyd, Esq., late of the trell service of Bengal, to Elizabeth, fourth and the trell service of Bengal, to Elizabeth, fourth and the trell service of Bengal, to Elizabeth, fourth and the trell service of Charles and the trell service of Bengal, to Elizabeth, fourth and the trell service of Charles and the trell service of Bengal, to Elizabeth, fourth and the property of Bengal, to Charles and Laughter of Pinc, Esq., of Moumouth, and the property of the Hon. F.I. Company's service, to Charles and Laughter of The Hate, I. Fannyay's service, to France, daughter of the late of Hate, and the property of the Hon. F.I. Company's service, to France, daughter of the late of Hate St. Description.

DFATHS.

April 6. On board the Kineston, on the passage from Calcutta, Ensign Chaiford Tait, 28th Bengal N.1., in mis 21st year. 24. At Rosend Castle, Fifeshire, Mrs. Broughton, widow of the late Mattern. Broughton, of Rosend, formerly Lieut.Governor of the Island of St. Henormerly Lieut-Governor of the Island of St. Helens.

**May I.** At Lyme Regs., Capt. Francis Sharpe, within a few hours after his arrival f.on India.

6. At Herne Bay, near Canterbury, Jas. Gilmour, Eag., M.D., of the Hon. E. I. Company's service, agd 61.

14. At Righton, Christian Wilkinson, wife of Capt. II. Hitchinson, of the Hon. E. I. Company's navel service, aged 39.

22. T. Hackhouse, who for many years commanded H.M. 47th regt., principally in the East and West-Indies, aged 65.

23. In Montague Square, after a long and painful lineary, Service.

Lately. A Thorfolk, in Virginia (U.S.), St. George Tucker, Eaq., uncle of Mr. Tucker, one of the present Directors of the Hon. E. I. Company.

GOODS DECLARED FOR SALE AT THE EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

For Sale 2 June-Prompt 29 August.

For Sale 2 June—Prompt 29 August.

Tet.—Bohea, 1,150,000 fb.; Congou, Campoi, Pekoe, and Souchong, 5,300,000 fb.; Twankay and Hyson-Skin, 1,000,000 fb.; Hyson, 250,000 fb.—Total, including Private-Trade, 7,700,000 fb.

For Sale 6 June—Prompt 5 September.

Company's and Licensed.—Cotton Wool.

1825.]

Home 1

Tor Sale 10 June—Prompt 8 September,
Company's—Bengal and Coast Piece Goods.
Private-Trade.—Sallampores—Blue Sallampores
Battas—Corahs—Gurrahs—Sannoes—Seersuckers—Pallampores—Brown, Blue, and Yellow Nankeens—Choppah Handkerchiefs—Madras
Handkerchiefs—Bandannoes—Silk Piece-Goods—Wrought Silks—Shawl Handkerchiefs—
Cashmere Shawl—Crapes—Damaska.
For Sale 13 June—Prompt 12 September.
Private-Trade.—Madeira Wine.
For Sale 23 June—Prompt 10 October.
Company's.—Bengal Raw Silk.—Bengal Raw
Silk—Bengal Chassun Silk—Persian Raw Silk.—
Bengal Chassun Silk—Persian Raw Silk.—
Eengal Chassun Silk—Persian Raw Silk.—
For Sale 16 July—Prompt 3 October.

For Sale 16 July-Prompt 3 October. Company's and Licensed .- Indigo. 7.9

CARGOES of EAST-INDIA COM-PANY'S SHIPS lately arrived.

CARGOES of the Buckinghamshire, Kellie Castle and Farquharson, from China; the Minerva, Cambridge, Kingston, Lady Macnaghten, and Royal George from Bengal; and the Protector, from Bengal and Madras.

Company's.—Tea—Bengal Coloured Piece-Goods
Bengal Raw Silk—Sugar—Indiga—Saltpetre— Cotton.

Private-Trade and Privilege.—Tess—Nankeens
—Raw Silk—Silks—Crapes—China-Piece Goods—Tortoseshell—Mother-o-Pearl — Rice—Turmerle —Rhubarh-Soy—India Ink—Bamboos—Rattans —Marble Slabs—Sherry.

| Madras & Bengal Destination  Madras & Bengal December & Bengal December Dec | Appointed    Appointed   Coxat.   Coxat | 1ST of SHIPS trading | 10 to | Ships   Name                         | ees. Gaptana. Fisher Reference for individual and i | E of GOOD HOPP    Whee   Reference   Industry | The content of the CAPE of GOOD HOPE.    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | July 20.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | July 20 Lang         | 88887                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 338 Wigram and Green H. Shuttleworth | f. Shuttleworthohn Lusk                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Lon. DocksLon. Docks                      | John Pire and Co. J. Binner, Church-row. |

|                        | 1          |
|------------------------|------------|
| .c. d. Commanders, &c. |            |
| Owners,                |            |
| Janaging               |            |
| with their I           |            |
| 1897-8                 | •          |
| Gordon                 | Scasou     |
| ,                      | 5          |
| ,                      | SHIF5,     |
|                        | COMPANYS   |
|                        | EAST-INDIA |
|                        |            |

|                           |                                                   |                     |                                                    |                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                             |                                                                                  |                                                                        | ;                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                           |                                               |                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                  |                     |
|---------------------------|---------------------------------------------------|---------------------|----------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------|-----------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------|
| When                      | Stried                                            | 182857ap        | 2 de 2                                             | SFeb.                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 21 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 27 2520 Apr                                                                                                             |                                                                                  |                                                                        | 1 Mar. 15 Mar 20 Apr. 28 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 31 Mar 3 Moy 12 do.                                                  | 31 do. 14Apr. 18May 26 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                           |                                               |                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                  |                     |
| su:ey;                | modunugunugunug                       | 1828.               | 3Dec. 8Jan.                                        | 23 do.                                                                                                                                              | 1828.1 Jan. 6 Feb.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 21 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                             | ,                                                                                | , 21 do                                                                | r 20Ap                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 3.00                                                                 | . 18%                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 8.8                       | , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , ,  | • •                                                                                        | · Š                                                                                                                              |                     |
| 213108119         | บรง Tเมาว                              | 1827.               | 3Dec.                                              | 3Dec. 18 do.                                                                                                                                        | 17/4/1                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 828. Jan. 1640.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                             | . 3360                                                                       | 1Feb. 15Feb. 21 do.                                                    | r. 15Ma                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | . 31M6                                                               | 14.4                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1828. 1828.               | 13May 3 June                                  | 29 do. 29 do.                                                                              | 12June 12Jly.                                                                                                                    |                     |
| To 70                     | Affoat.                                           | 1827.               | 20.061                                             | 3Dec                                                                                                                                                | 18 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 1828-                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | -                                                                                                                           |                                                                                  |                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                           |                                               |                                                                                            | 121                                                                                                                              |                     |
|                           | Consignments.                                     |                     | 23                                                 | gal, & China Bengal & China                                                                                                                         | Bengal & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Bombay & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | Bengal & China (St. Helcina, Bombalan, & China                                                                              | لتتر                                                                             | Mauntius & China                                                       | Сина                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Madras & Bengal                                                      | Bengal                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | , Dames                   | China & Haifas                                | Bengal                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                  |                     |
|                           | Pursers.                                          |                     | J. K. Jolly Francis Burlin J. Giles                | T. Buttanshaw D. Marshall Geo. Wand Thos. N. Were John Millard J. H. Lanyon G. Braithwaite Henry Burn . Jas. M. Barid Thos. N. Beverdée W. Maltman. | W. Drayner J. Elphinistone D. Roberton P. J. Maxwell Dard Soft J. W. Brosser M. W. Trechurst D. J. Ward John Rose T. Proc. Leach R. Tabor T. Proc. Leach R. Tabor T. Proc. Leach B. Tabor T. Proc. Lea | W. DickinsonWm. Dallas                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | Henry Arnot Wm. Ainshe E. Turner J. W. Graham Thos. Cron . T.Collingwood                                                    |                                                                                  | C. S. ComptonJohn Main                                             | H. BevendgeR. Dudgeon                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Alex. Crowe                                                          | Honey MilletW. I. Irwm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                           | 1111                                          | 111                                                                                        | 11                                                                                                                               |                     |
|                           | Surgeons.                                         |                     | J. K. Jolly Francis Burlin J. Giles                | John MillardJas. Beveridge                                                                                                                      | David Scott -Alex. StirlingT. Davidson-                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Jas. Grant .Rich. H. CoxW. Hitchcock                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | Henry ArnotE. Turner                                                                                                    |                                                                                  | R. Burroughes J. H. LindinH. W. Parker S. H. Macauley Robt. Martin | tt F. Kierban                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | W. Bremner .                                                         | Wm. Cook                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | ಟ                         | •                                             |                                                                                            | 111                                                                                                                              |                     |
|                           | FourthOfficers.                                   |                     | J. K. Jolly                                        | Thos. N. Were                                                                                                                                       | P. J. Maxwell A. Macqueen H. Dalrymple                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | C. UdaleC. WelsteadW. Pitcaim                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | E. DupuisHenry Smith                                                                                                    | H. J. Woire John WilleJohn Pitcaim Chas. Ray                                 | R. Burroughes J. H. Lindin                                             | J. Dalrymple R. Howard .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Charles Jone                                                         | Chas. White D. RunkinEdward Voss PenruddockeJ. Copling G. Abbott                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | VOYAGI                    | 111                                           | 111                                                                                        | 111                                                                                                                              | -                   |
| -                         | hird Officers.                                    |                     |                                                    | as. M. Baird                                                                                                                                        | ohn Rose .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Samuel HydeGeo. Steward                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | H. SnepaeraBoulter J. BellMm. Pigott                                                                                | H. J. WoifeJohn Pitcaim                                                      | R. BurrougheH. W. Parker                                           | J. DalrympleG. Creighton                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | O. Richardsol J. R. Pidding                                          | Chas. WhiteEdward VossJ. Coplung                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | for ONE                   | 111                                           | 111                                                                                        | 111                                                                                                                              | _                   |
| ,                         | ond Officers. 1                                   |                     | mes Rickett'n                                      | enry Burn                                                                                                                                           | Elphimstone IJ. Ward . J. Tabor                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | W. Loveralge Phos. Sandys                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Geo. Frampton H. SnepnessJ. P. Griffiths Boulter J. Bell E. DupuisF. G. Moore Mm. Pigott Henry Smil                 |                                                                                  | F.W. Marriott                                                          | Henry Wise                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | W. K. Packman, O. Richardson,R. M. Isacke, J. R. Pydding         | Henry Harris J. A. Senhouse M. Murray J. Miller                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | CHARTERED for ONE VOYAGE. | 11                                            |                                                                                            | 111                                                                                                                              | _                   |
| T C C I N                 | Commit Officers. Third Officers. Fourth Officers. | rst Officers. Ser   | hn Shute ·· Ja                                     | ton G. Braithwaite Henry Burn Jas. M. Baird                                                                                                         | Drayner J. Treehurst D. Hos. Leach                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | dw. Jacob · · C. J. Dyer · · · T                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Jas. S. Biles Geo. Frampton'i I. Shepharia. Rees Thomas. J. P. Griffiths Boulter J. Bell Wm. Pulham F. G. Moore. Mm. Pigott | W. Haylett . John Fenn                                                           | Geo. Deudney T.W. Marriott                                             | de St.Croix                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | Rivers                                                               | Volume 1335 Compous, 28, p. Huborha. R. M. Hacke, J. M. Mohoff, E. Bhas. "If Creek John Milroy." On Control of State of  | CH                        |                                               |                                                                                            | 1111                                                                                                                             |                     |
| EAST-INDIA COMFANTS STITE |                                                   | Commanders.   Fi    | ol . Iomilton                                      |                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | John Innes Jas. S. Biles Geo. FramptoB. Broughton Rees Thomas J. P. GriffithWest Thomas F. G. Moore                 | T. Larkins                                                                       | James Walker                                                           | Charles Steward N. de St. Crob. Benj. June. J. Dalrymple R. Howard J. G. F. Pigott F. Kiernan J. Thomas Dunkin G. C. Kennedy Henry Wise J. Dansyman J. G. F. Pigott F. Kiernan J. Thomas Dunkin G. C. A. Broadhurst G. C. Feighton J. G. F. French D. T. Roy | Philip BaylisTimothy Smith                                       | Henry Hosmer Thos. Marquis- C. E. Mangles T. F. Balderston                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                           | James Eyles                                   | John CragieThos. Delafons                                                              | Joseph Grote R. Thornhill George Holliday                                                                                        |                     |
| EAST-IND                  | -                                                 | ManagingOwners. | is remaind . John Shute . James Rickett R. Buckle. | 1325 H. Bonham Henry Bax                                                                                                                            | 1334 S. Marjoribanks A                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 12) Mac Taggett 1.5. First Market Thomas T. Shepherd 1.5. From C. Udale 1.3s. Graft M.C. Market M.C. Lidale 1.3s. Graft M.C. M. Dickinson 1.12 S. Majoritanis Fred. Market M.C. Fred. Market M.C. S. Timurs Rich Jacob - CWI for erdige Samuel Pict. C. Welstead - Buch. H. Cox. W. Dickinson 1.15 John F. Timurs Chas. S. Timurs Rich Jacob - CWI for erdige Samuel Pict. S. Shepherd 1.5. Fred. Market J. Cox. S. S. Market M. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas - H. J. Oper - Thos. Samtys Gov. S. S. Market M. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas - M. Daniell - T. J. Dyer - Thos. Samtys Gov. S. S. Market M. P. Market M. M. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas - M. Daniell - T. J. Dyer - Thos. Samtys Gov. S. S. Market M. P. Market M. M. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas - M. Daniell - T. J. Dyer - Thos. Samtys Gov. S. S. Market M. P. Market M. M. | 1330 H. Bonham John Innes1417 Company's Step B. Broughto                                                                | Company's ShipW. C. Drysdale                                                 | John Campbell                                                          | H. Blanchard                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Canning 1326 Company's Ship                                          | 1935 Matthew Isacke W. E. Farrer 1938 H. Bonham Thos. Marquis-1024 Thos. Marquis-1024 Thos. Marquis-1024 C. E. Mangles-1020 W. Mgram T. F. Badderston 1931 H. Bonham T. F. Badderston                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                           | 605 Robert W. Eyles James Eyles               | 564 G. Hillhouse John Cragie 563 George Joad Thos. Delafons 583 George Joad Thos. Delafons | 513 Thomas Ward Joseph Grote513 Thomas Ward Joseph Grote650 Henry Templer R. Thomhill559 Thomas Ward George Holliday | The June plan comme |
|                           | -                                                 | ruo T        | 1                                                  | 155155155155155155155155155155                                                                                  | 134                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | ty 127913321415                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 8 13(S) 14                                                                                                              | 1329                                                                             | 1333                                                                   | 200                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                      | 18. 19.19. 19. 19.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | }              |                                               |                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                  |                     |
|                           |                                                   | Ships.              |                                                    | 6 Dunira                                                                                                                                            | 8 General Harris 1280 Sames comes Alex, Chrystoe for Thomas Courts. 1334 S. Marjoribanks Alex, O. M. Taggar, p. m. 2004 1342 Joseph Hare.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | Sar Little Annual Life J. Mac Taggart J. S. L. Lines. 9 Marquis of Hunty 12/9 J. Marjoribanks Fred. Madan 4 Beruckshire (1415 John F. Tunns (145-5) Helione F. M. Daniell Helione                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Duchess of Athall 1330 W. L. Fellers Aberrombie 1330 H. Bonham Robinson 1417 Company's Step                                 | 9 George the Fourth 1329 Company's Shipo Marsons Camden: 1261 W. C. Drysdale | Marqueen 1333 John Campbell                                            | 4 William Faulte 11343 Joseph Baten Charles Steward N. de St. (1913 Berly Barry 1914) 4 Blanker Charles Steward N. de St. (1913 Henry Wise 2 Lord Luncther 1914 H. Glestranes Thomas Dunkin G. C. Kennedy A. Broadhurs                                       | 8 Castle Huntly 1334 Company's Ship6 Canning 1336 Company's Ship | Demonth 1335 Matthew Bastle W. F. Faire R. H. Treherne Henry Harris V. W. W. Cook F. J. P. Prinkin - IW. Cook F. J. Prinkin - IW. Cook F. J. Prinke Barter F. Barter F. Barter Scott - IW. Scott - IW. P. Prinke Marquis L. Schhuuge, Chas. White T. D. Runkin - IW. Scott - IW. P. Prinkin M. Murray Edward Voss Pennddocke Wm. Scott - IW. P. Prinkin M. Murray Edward Voss Pennddocke Wm. Scott - IW. P. Prinkin M. Murray Edward Voss Pennddocke Wm. Remwick - IW. Gorlung - I. Coplung - I. Coplung - I. S. Baderston Robt. Pitcher J. Miller - I. Coplung - I. S. Baderston Robt. Pitcher J. Miller - I. Coplung - I. Remwick - IW. F. Baderston Robt. Pitcher J. Miller - I. Coplung - I. Remwick - IW. R | 9.4814                    | Malcolm                                       | Hercules                                                                                   | AbbertonJames PattisonMoiraSusan                                                                                     | Maitland            |
|                           |                                                   | ລສິ ນ /ຄ້    | 0.11                                               | 10.01                                                                                                                                        | 8 9                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 404-                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 4 01 1                                                                                                                      | -010                                                                             | - 1                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                           |                                               |                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                  |                     |

PRICE CURRENT, May 27.

| •                                                 |              |     | CU                                              | 111    | tractity tracy with                                                                       |  |
|---------------------------------------------------|--------------|-----|-------------------------------------------------|--------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--|
| EAST-INDIA F                                      | RODU         | CE. |                                                 |        | E. s. d. E. s. d. Indigo, Blue                                                            |  |
| Coffee, Java ·····cwt                             | £. s.        | đ.  | £. s.                                           | d.     | Blue and Violet 0 9 0 0 9 6 Purple and Violet 0 9 0 0 9 6                                 |  |
| Cheribon · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·    | 1 151 12 |     | 2 5                                             | 0      | Violet                                                                                    |  |
| Bourbon ·····                                     |              | -   | 1 16                                            | 0      | — Copper 0 5 6 — 0 7 0                                                                    |  |
| Cotton, Surat                                     | 3 5          | 0 = | 5 0                                             | 5      | — Consuming sorts · · · · 0 3 6 — 0 5 9— Oude good and fine · · 0 4 6 — 0 6 9         |  |
| Madras                                            | 0 0          | 4 - | 0 0                                             | 5      | — Do. middling · · · · · · 0 3 0 — 0 4 0 — Low and bad Oude · · · · 0 0 2 — 0 2 6         |  |
| Bengal                                            |              | 4 - | 0 0                                             | 59 | Low and bad Oude · · · · 0 0 2 0 2 6 Madras · · · · · · · · · 0 5 0 0 6 9                 |  |
| Drugs & for Dyeing.                               | 0 0          | , - | 0 0                                             | ,      | - Do. mid. ord. and bad 0 2 4 - 0 4 9                                                     |  |
| Aloes, Epatica · · · · cwt.                       |              | 0   | 14 0                                            | 0      | Rice, Bengal Whitecwt. 0 11 0 - 0 15 0                                                    |  |
| Annisceds, Star                                   |              |     | 4 0                                             | 0      |                                                                                           |  |
| Unrefined, or Tincal                              |              | 0 - | 2 6                                             | 0      | Safflower 1 0 0 — 7 10 0Sago 0 12 0 — 1 10 0                                          |  |
| Camphire                                          | 7 10         | ŏ   | 8 0                                             | 0      | Saltpetre 1 3 6 - 1 11 0                                                                  |  |
| Cardamoms, Malabar lb                             | 0 1          | 0 - | 0 1                                             | 0      | Silk, Bengal Skein 1bNovi 0 14 11 — 1 1 11                                            |  |
| Cassia Budscwt.                                   | 5 0          | 0   | 5 10                                            | ŏ      | Ditto White 0 15 9 - 1 3 5                                                                |  |
| Lignea                                            | 4 2          | 0   | 5 0                                             | 0      | — China · · · · · · · · 0 18 4 — 0 19 8                                                   |  |
| Castor ÖilthDragon's Bloodcwt.                | 3 0          | 8 - | 0 1                                             | 6      | Spices, Cinnamon 0 4 0 — 0 7 0— Cloves 0 1 2 — 0 2 0                                  |  |
| Gum Ammoniac, lump.                               | 3 0          | 0 = | 12 05 0                                     | 0      | - Mace 0 3 8 - 0 5 7                                                                      |  |
| Arabic ·····                                      | 1 5          | ö - | 3 10                                            | ŏ      | Nutmegs 0 2 11 0 3 2                                                                      |  |
| — Assafortida · · · · · · ·                       | 3 15         | 0   |                                                 |        | Ginger cwt. 0 15 0 0 17 0                                                                 |  |
| Benjamin                                          | 2 0          | 0 - |                                                 | 0      | — Pepper, Blacklb 0 0 3 — 0 0 4 — White 0 0 7 — 0 1 2                                     |  |
| - Anmi Gambogium                                  | 3 020 0  | 0 - |                                                 | 0      | Sugar, Bengalcwt. 1 11 0 - 1 18 0                                                         |  |
| Myrrh · · · · · · · ·                             |              | 0 - | 8 0                                             | ŏ      | Siam and China 1 9 0 1 18 0                                                               |  |
| Ollbanum · · · · · · ·                            | 2 10         | 0   | 5 10                                            | 0      | Mauritius · · · · · · · · 1 7 0 - 1 19 0                                                  |  |
| Kino                                              |              |     | 14 0                                            | 0      | Tea, Bohea                                                                                |  |
| Lac Lake th                                       | 0 1          | 6 - | $\begin{array}{ccc} 0 & 1 \\ 0 & 3 \end{array}$ | 8      | Congou 0 2 2 0 2 3Souchong 0 3 0 0 4 9                                                |  |
| Shellcwt.                                         | 3 16         | 8 = | 5 10                                            | ö      | — Campui 0 2 5 — 0 2 1                                                                    |  |
| Stick                                             | 3 0          | 0 - | 4 0                                             | 0      | Twankay · · · · · · · 0 2 0 - 0 3 8                                                       |  |
| Musk, China oz.                                   | 1 5          | 0 - | 1 16                                            | 0      | Pekoe · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·                                               |  |
| Oil, Cassia · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · | 0 0          | 5 — | 0.10                                            | 0      |                                                                                           |  |
| — Cloves ······ th                                | őő           | 9 = | 0 1                                             | ő      | - Voung Hyson · · · · ·                                                                   |  |
| Mace                                              | 0 0          | 1   | 0 0                                             | 2      | Guopowder · · · · · · ·                                                                   |  |
| Nutmegs                                           | 0 2          | 9 — | 0 3                                             | 0      | Tortoiseshell · · · · · · · · · 1 8 0 — 2 0 0Wood, Sanders Red · · ton 9 0 0 — 10 0 0 |  |
| Rhubarb                                           | 0 1          | 6 - | 0 5                                             | 6      |                                                                                           |  |
| Sal Ammoniac cwt.                                 | 2 15         | 0   |                                                 |        | AUSTRALIAN PRODUCE.                                                                       |  |
| Turmeric, Java cwt.                               | 0 0          | 9 - | 0 2                                             | 0      | Oil, Southern tun 30 0 0 0 — Sperin 82 0 0                                                |  |
| Bengal                                            | 1 7          | 0 = | 1 11                                            | ö      |                                                                                           |  |
| — China                                           | î 16         | 0 - | 2 2                                             | ŏ      | Wool                                                                                      |  |
| Galls, in Sorts                                   | 3 10         | 0 - | 4 4                                             | 0      | Wood, Blue Gum ton 0 6 0 - 0 7 0                                                          |  |
| , Blue · · · · · · ·                              | 4 0          | 0   | 4 10                                            | 0      | — Cedar · · · · · · 0 0 5 — 0 0 0                                                         |  |
|                                                   |              |     |                                                 |        |                                                                                           |  |

DAILY PRICES OF STOCKS, from 26 April to 25 May,

|      |                | DAIL              | TRIC                  | 129 ()1               |                              | KS, Jron                 | 1 20 Mpm                          | 1025             | may.            |                    |
|------|----------------|-------------------|-----------------------|-----------------------|------------------------------|--------------------------|-----------------------------------|------------------|-----------------|--------------------|
| Apr. | BankStock. | 3 Pr. Ct.Red. | 3 Pr. Ct.Consols. | 3} Pr.Ct.Consols. | 3½ P1.Ct.Red.            | N. 4P1.C.                | LongAnnuities.                | IndiaStock.  | IndiaBonds. | Exch.Bills.    |
| 26   | 208 (9)        | 85 1851           | 85 [86                | _                     | 92193                        | 10231023                 | 191 195                           | 249              | —        | 64 65              |
| 28   |                | 85 85             |                       | 93                    | 92793                        | 102 102                  | 19 19                             |                  | 99p             | 64 65              |
| 29   | 208,9          | 85 85             | 857867                | 931                   | 931                          | 1027103                  | 191 193                           |                  | 99100p          | 64 65              |
| 30   | 2081 3         | 85 85             | 85,86                 | 93                    | $92_{1}^{3}93$               | 102 103                  | 191 127                           | 249}             | 99100p          | 64 66              |
| 31   | _              | - `        | _                     |                | _                            | _                        | _ "                               | _                | _               | _                  |
| May  |                | 1                 | l                     | i                     |                              |                          |                                   |                  |                 |                    |
| 1    |                | _                 | -              |                       | -                            | -                        |                                   | _                | -               |                    |
| 2    |                | 843817            | 851858                | 923923                | 923923                       | $102_8^{5}102_8^{7}$     | 19% 191                           |                  | 97 98p          |                    |
| 3    | 20718          | 84184             | 851853                |                       | 92,192,                      | 10231023                 | 19류 19를                           |                  | _               | 64 65              |
| 5    | _              | 84 84             | 851853                |                       | 921921                       | 102 102 1                | $19\frac{1}{4}$ $19\frac{3}{16}$  | 249              |                 | 64 661             |
| 6    | _              | 84 84             | 851851                | 921923                | 921921                       | 102 102                  | 19 19 19                          | $248\frac{1}{2}$ | 97p             | 66 671             |
| 7    | -              | 84384             | 85 85 3               | 928                   | 92192#                       | 102¦102\$                | $19\frac{1}{6}$ $19\frac{1}{4}$   | 2183             |                 | 65 661             |
| 8    | 207            | 84384             | 851857                | 921                   | 921921                       | 10231025                 | 193                               |                  | _               | 64 661             |
| 9    | 2071           | 84 3 84           | 85 85                 | 921                   | 921921                       | 102   102                | 191 193                           |                  |                 | 64 65p             |
| 10   | _              | 84 384 3          | 851851                | -                     | 921921                       | 102,102,                 | $19\frac{1}{1}$ $19\frac{1}{16}$  | _                | 98p             | 63 65              |
| 12   | 2063           | 84 84 3           | 85 85                 | -                     | 921928                       | $102^{1}_{2}102^{5}_{8}$ | 19計 19青                           | 248              | 97 99p          |                    |
| 13   | _              |                   | 858851                | 921                   | 923923                       | 102 102                  | $19\frac{1}{16}$ $19\frac{1}{16}$ | _                | 98_99p          |                    |
| 14   | 20718          | 85 851            | 85 86                 | 923                   | 92193                        | 102   103                | $19_{6}^{}19_{4}^{}$            | _                | 97p             | 63 65 <sub>F</sub> |
| 15   |                | _ `               | _                     |                       |                              |                   | - 1                               | _                |                 |                    |
| 16   | 20638          | 841848            | 851851                | 928                   | 921921                       | 10211023                 | 191 191                           | 248              |                 | 63 65 p     |
| 17   |                |                   | 851851                |                       | 923925                       | 102 1102 7               | 1919 191                          |                  | 97 99p          |                    |
| 19   | -              | 85 854            | 85186                 |                       | 92793                        | 10281027                 |                                   | $249\frac{1}{2}$ | 98 99p          |                    |
| 20   | 207            |                   | 85 853                |                       | 921921                       | 102 102                  | 19計 19情                           | _                | 98 99p          |                    |
| 21   | 206}7          | 843847            | 85 85                 | 925                   | $92\frac{1}{2}92\frac{5}{8}$ | 102 102 1                |                                   |                  |                 | 64 65p             |
| 22   | 20617          | 84 84             | 85 85                 | 928924                | 92892                        | 1021102                  | 1916                              | _                |                 | 63 65p62 64p   |
| 23   | 2061 3         | 848847            | 85 85 85 8            | 923                   | 921923                       | 10281028                 | 191                               | 248              | 98 99p          |                    |
| 24   | -              | 85885             | 85 3853               | 92]                   | 921928                       | 102   102 }              | 198 1916                          | 248              | 90 99p          | 01 09b             |
|      | 1              |                   | 1                     | 1                     | l                            |                          |                                   |                  | 1 84-           |                    |

INDEX.

A

Ackyab, establishment of a dawk between, and Chittagong, 101—Mug levy at, disarmed, ib.—sickness at, 687.

Adam (Mr. John), character of, 622.

Aerolites, supposed origin of, 60.

Africa, names of sovereigns in, 496-British travellers in, 665, 805.

Agricultural Society of Calcutta—meetings of, 62, 352, 659, 805—prize subjects put forth by, 493.

Ahmedabad, assault of a judge at, 392.

Ainslie (Dr.), on the constitutions best suited to the climate of India, 742.

Alligator destroyed at Calcutta, 99.

Amherst (Lord), particulars of his tour to the Upper Provinces of India, 262, 367—returns to Calcutta, 499, 508 entertainment to, 818.

508. (Lady), drawing room held by,

Amherstia nobilis, account of the tree so denominated, 494.

Amherst Town, dangerous harbour at, 509.
Amsterdam (Island of), rescue of two men from, 823.

Animals, hospitals for, in India, 663 analogy between fossil and living, 666. Anthropophagy amongst the Battaks, 448. Antiquities, Egyptian, 143—Hindu, 511.

Antiquities, Egyptian, 143—Hindu, 511.
Aphorisms from Hindu writers, 771.
Appeals from India, heard before the Privy Council—Ruttonjee and another, v. Cawasjee, 403—Mullick, v. Mullick, 409 —White, v. Cleghorn, 707—Nauchier, v. Setuputty, 721.

Aral Sea, change in, 15.

Army (Indian)—plan for recruiting in, 370—remarks on the present system of granting pensions to retired officers in, 464—General orders issued to; also promotions in: see Calcutta, Madras, &c.

(British), serving in the East—promotions and changes in, 145, 284, 411, 505,708,838—furloughs of officers from, 73, 240, 367, 505—general order issued to, on the demise of the Duke of York, 234—relief of corps, 412—further donation to the regiments employed in the Burmese war, 499—accommodation for sick officers of, at Bombay, 690—desertion of an officer from, 69, 411—dismissal of Lieut. Bernard from, 234—court-martial on officers in, 109, 232, 502.

Asam, discoveries to the eastward of, 102.

Asia, increase of Russian power in, 494 —principal sovereigns of, 496.

(Central), travels of Mr. Moorcroft and Mr. Guthrie in, 157—intrigues of the Russians in, 158.

Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland—proceedings of, 55, 222, 348, 481, 655, 796—answers to inquiries put forth by, 195—fifth anniversary of, 483 —glance at its proceedings during the past year, ib.

of, 60, 350, 492, 802.

Atlantic, union of, with the Pacific, 498.
Attaran River, excursion up, 666.

Australasia, periodicals published in, 232
—see also New South Wates and Van Diemen's Land.

Azof Sea, change in, 15.

В.

Ball at Madras, 386—at Colombo, 700. Bangkok, journal of residence at, 9. Bassem, account of, 203.

Battaks, anthropophagy amongst, 448. Beer, patent composition for making, 260. Beggars in China, 68.

Bellary, state of education in, 616. Benevolence, Hindu system of, 165, Bengal United Service Club—first meeting of, 98, 371.

Mariner's Fund-state of its affairs, 374.

Bentinck (Lord W. C.), farewell dinner to, 143.

Bernard (Lieut.) dismissed from his Majesty's service, 234.

Bhurtpore, treasure found at, recognized as prize, 259, 284.

Bijnee, account of, 807.

Black Sea, change in, 15.

Blood, fall of, from the skies, 515.

Bokhara, situation of the Jews in, 67-natural history of, 207.

Bombay

Bombay Government (General Orders of) appointment of a fort adjutant at Asseerghur, 388-pay of guides to troops, ib. - issue of knapsacks to troops, ib. allowances to veterinary surgeons, ib .-Baroda independent company, ib.—supplies to European travellers, ib. military insane patients, 389-new governor, 690-honours to Mr. Elphinstone, ib.—accommodation for sick of-ficers, ib.—dismissal of officiating assist. Surgeons, 829-pensions to widows of European soldiers, 830-tea and sugar to troops, ib .- applications to become officiating paymasters, ib.—security of regimental paymasters, ib.—Salarics of deputy judge advocates' general, ib .commissariat arrangements, ib .- requisitions of civil officers for military aid, 831-new corps of Golundauze, tb .allowances to executive engineers, 1b .courts-martial, 109-civil and military appointments, 110, 282, 389, 520, 690, 831-marine promotions, 691, 832, Bombay (local occurrences at) - Armenian highwayman, 111, 275 - examination of the Engineer Institution, 276-dispute amongst the Parsees, 277-robberies, ib .- average fall of rain, 355lost gaiety, 393-arrival of Sir John Malcolin, the new governor, 520-notice to ships entering the harbour, 522 -addresses to the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone, 692-arrival of the Ganges steam-vessel, 698-severe storm, 16.non-enforcement of the stamp regulation, 699-discontinuation of the Iris newspaper, ib .- fete, 833-shipping intelligence, births, marriages, and deaths, 112, 282, 393, 522, 699, 833.

Supreme Court—trial of Hurgovandas Jugicevandas and others for a conspiracy, 111, 275—squabble between Mr. Parry and Mr. Graham, 274, 521 trial of Onan Kivork, for shooting ataghorah wallah, 275—law appointments, 698.

Literary Society—address of the secretary on the resignation of the Hon. Mr. Elphinstone as president, 659 election of Sir John Malcolm to be president, 662—special meeting of, 802.

Pative Education Society, third report of, 275.

Bible Society, ninth annual report of, 520.

Bor Kamptis, discoveries in the country of, 102.

Borneo, account of the north-west coast of, 729.

Briggs (Col.), review of his 'Letters on India,' 786.

Burman Empire—account of the province of Bassein, 202—visit to Ava, 228— Burmsee mode of taking and taming elephants, 229—return of the Burmese ambassador from Calcutta, 283—account of the provinces ceded to the British, 345—exertions made at Rangoon to pay the third instalment, 404, 676—excursion up the San-luen river, 633—account of the country on the banks of the Attaran river, 676—affairs at Rangoon, 676, 829.

Bushire, outrage committed on the British resident at, 99—fracas between Capt. Betham and the Sheikh of, 400.

C.

Cala-Yavana, story of, 215.

Calcutta Government (General Orders of) appointment of a deputy judge advocate general for the coded Burmese provinces, 69-dismissal of Lieut. Scott from his Majesty's service, ib .- services of officiating assist, surgeons dispensed with, ib .- new organization and distribution of the artillery, th .- discharge of sub-assist. veterinary surgeons, 234--mourning for the late Duke of York, ib. -absence of civil servants, 1b .- dismissal of Lieut. Bernard, ib,-appointments abolished, 235-applications for staff appointments, ib,—suspension of Capt. C. C. Smith, for ill treatment of natives, b.—extraordinary conduct of Brigadier Murray, 236— Practice of courts-martial, 337—general examination of regimental interpreters, ib .- relief of troops at Mhow, 238, 499—Palembang prize-money, 362—absence of officers on staff employment, 362, 500 -increase of sub-assistants commissary general, 363-general relief of troops, ib .- new member of council, ib .- tour of the Commander-in-chief, 364, 501 -wilful perjury of natives, 364-complaint against Lieut. Col. Gardner, ib. -additional battalions to the engineers and artillery, 499, 671—the Governor-General, 499-further donation to the troops employed in the Burmese war, ib .- eligibility of officers to staff appointments, 500-demise of the King of Oude, ib .- merits of Lieut. Col. Watson, adj. gen. of the army, 501liability of chaplains to martial law, ib. -allowances for veterinary surgeons, 669-new mode of drawing regimental pay and allowances, ib .- robbery and murder of sepaliees, 671-duties of superintending surgeons, ib. - annual practice of the artillery, ib. - provisions to European soldiery, ib .- funeral expenses of European soldiers, 808-accounts of military paymasters, ib .- certificates of individuals returning to Europe, ib.—relief of troops, ib.—neglect in forwarding staff reports, 809—superintendent of cadets, ib .- officers' allowances, ib.—services of Maj. Gen. Sir T. Reynell, ib.—services of Lieut. Col. Tidy, 810—promotion of Lieut. Col. Com. M'Leod, ib. -returns of baptisms, marriages, marriages, and burials, ib.—escorts at Gwalior, Oodipoor, and Kotah, ib.—courts-martial, 70, 238, 365, 502, 811.

—civil and military appointments, 71, 239, 281, 365, 502, 672, 811.

Calcutta (local occurrences at) - severe storm, 98-fracas on the race course, 257-Unitarians, 258, 817-answer of government to the debtors confined in the gool, 260-new interest on treasury notes, 265-concert, 373-native parties, 374-murder of a child, 375-change in the management of the stamp duties, 376-meeting for the purpose of petitioning parliament for the equalization of the duties on East and West India sugars, 506, 679-also for the removal of the restrictions on the resort of British subjects to India, 502, 682-assemblies, 509-markets in November, 511-coroner's inquest, 512-destruction of Pariah dogs, 513-cholera morbus, ib. -improvements, ib.-attempts of an informer, ib.-entertainment on board a French corvette, 678-affray in the Loll Bazar, 680-fire at the Jaun Bazar, 682-races, 821-shipping intelligence, hirths, marriages, and deaths, 102, 265, 281, 377, 516, 682, 825.

tion of the stamp tax at, 1.

, review of a work so entitled, 303.

Supreme Court—registration of the stamp regulation, 73, 240—perjury of natives in justifying bail, 505, 676—case of the Rev. Jas. Bayce, D.D., v. Samuel Smith, for a libel, 674—conviction of three Chinese for murder, 676—exorbitance of officers' fees, 676—tharge of Sir Edward Ryan to the Grand Jury on the subject of juries, 813.

Asiatic Society, proceedings of, 60, 350, 492, 802.

Proceedings of, 61, 225, 351, 493, 659.

Agricultural and Horticultural Society, meetings of, 62, 352, 493, 659, 805.

Auxiliary Church Missionary Society, tenth annual meeting of, 101.

Bible Association, annual meeting upon the works published by, 738.

Apprenticing Society, state of the funds of, 680.

Beef-steak Club, revival of, 681.

Canara, journal of a route through, 603, 763.

Cannon, Turkish, weight of, 67.

Cape of Good Hope—introduction of the silk-worm into the colony, 144—duels at Cape Town, 283—new governor, 284—colonial appointments, 402—the late irruption of the natives, ib.—new

Supreme Court, ib.—visit of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, 403—dangerous shoal said to lie off Algoa Bay, ib. births, marriages, and deaths, 403,835. Cargoes of Company's ships lately arrived, 146, 286, 414, 568, 710, 841. Cashmere, history of, according to Hindu authors, 22.

Caspian Sea, change in, 15.

Ceylon, civil appointments at, 112, 278—celebration of his Majesty's birth-day at Colombo, 112—first report of the American Missionary Seminary at Jaffna, 391—judicial appointments at, 699—grand fancy ball at Colombo, 700—new school for native youth, ib.—elephant-hunting, ib.—births, marriages, and deaths, 112, 278, 394, 701.

Chambers (Colonel and Mrs.), sudden death of, 386.

Chank Fish, habits of, 354.

Chaplains, military, in India-law respecting, 501.

Cherck Puja, account of the festival of, 32. China-curious police proclamation, 31particulars respecting the trade regula-tions of Canton, 48—Chinese map of the empire, 57—beggars, 68—literary curiosity, ib .- progress of the war in Tartary, 117, 398, 470, 525, 703seat of the war, 397-description of the emperor, 117 - Chinese cant, ib. crime in the empire, 118-consumption of foreign cotton, ib -titles and offices, 167, 297-secret despatches, 232 -proclamation prohibiting females from being spectators at illuminations and processions, 398-case of matricide by poison, 470-snake-catchers, 497-establishment of an English newspaper at Canton, 524-finances of the country, ib -disturbance between the Chinese and Americans at Canton, 703-coins, 806-arrival of East-India Company's ships, 399, 525-births at Macao, 703 -death of Sir William Fraser, 834.

Chinese language, remarks of M. Klaproth upon the keys or radicals in, 662.

Cholera, new treatment of, 62—prescription for a powerful medicine for, 108—its ravages at Jubulpore, 260—prevails at Calcutta, 513.

Cwilians, difference in the rank of, at the three presidencies, 21.

Civil Service Annuity Fund of Bengalgeneral meeting, of, 261, 823-regulations of, 677.

Clapperton (Capt.), death of, 665, 805. Clarke (Mr.), false accusation against, 374. Cleopatra's needle, plan for removing it to England, 144.

Cleveland (late judge of Boglipoor), character of, 624.

Cochin-China, Chinese account of, 230. Coch's spur, death by a, 519.

· Cole

Cole (Sir G. L.), appointed Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, 234.

College, East-India, at Haileybury, examination at, in December 1827, 58.

of Fort St. George, examination at, in July 1827, 232.

of Fort William—review of the proceedings of the institution for 1826-27, 357—works patronized by the college council, 360—names of the students examined in June, 361.

Colville (Sir C.), appointed governor of the Mauritius, 284.

Combernere (Lord), particulars of his tour to Upper India, 364, 816—grand dinner to, 513—character of, 623.

Concert at Calcutta, 373.

Concremation, remarks of the native press upon, 370.

Constantinople, historical works at, 462.
Converts, oppression of, in Turkey, 400
—persecution of, in India, 509.

Coorg country, journal of a route through, 603, 763.

Cotton, consumption of, in China, 118.
Court-martial on Capt. Wiggins, 70—private J. Jones, 105—Brevet Capt. O'Connor, 109— Lieut. Courtayne, 238—Ensign Tulloh, 365—Ensign R. Going, 380—Lieut. M'Gregor, 502—Pwktah (a camp follower), 811—Ensign Hull, 827—general orders by the Madras Government in regard to punishments by, 267, 404, 826—also by the Bengal Government, 237.

Court of King's Rench—Manton v. Mills, 283—Rex v. Sutton and others for a conspiracy to negociate the sale of an East-India cadetey, 527.

Crime, state of, in China, 118-in New South Wales, 401.

n

Dallas (Col. C.), appointed governor of St. Helena, 411.

Dalrymple (Capt.), fracas between, and Lieut. M'Donnell, at Calcutta, 257.

Daniel (T. and W.), notice of their 'Illustrations of India,' 352.

Davies (Lieut. Col.), further particulars of the assassination of, 272.

Debate at the East-India House on the 19th December, 1827—East-India volunteers, 119—half-year's dividend, ib.—grant to Capt. T. Buchanan, ib.—stamp duties in Calcutta, 126—imprisonment for debt in India, 137—suspension of Judge Smith, 138—court of inquiry, 140—instruction of cadets and others in the Hindoostanee language, ib.—March 19. Account of the Company's stock, 569—gensions and superannuations, tb.—grant to Capt. T. Buchanan, ib.—Indian suttees, 572—suspension of Mr. Courtenay Smith, ib.—Carnatic debt, 573—Calcutta stamp regulations, 577—sbuse of patronage, 581—the treasury, ib.

Debates on concremation—remarks of the Samachar Chandrika upon, 370.

Debtors, answer of the government to those confined at Calcutta, 260.

Deccan, account of the British territories in, 188, 318—further distribution of the booty captured in, 505.

Desertion, cause of, in the Bengal army, 370.

Directors, East-India, for 1828, 710.

Dogs, Pariah, destruction of, at Singapore, 395—at Calcutta, 513—fidelity of,

Dol Jatra, festival of, 102.

Doongul, tiger excursion at, 64.

Drama, Hindu, analysis of Mr. Wilson's select specimens of, 289, 417, 585.

Dreams, efficacy of, 63.

Duels at the Cape of Good Hope, 283plan to prevent, 658.

Dugong, skeleton of, 492.

Dunn (Mr.), charitable bequests of, 514.

E.

Earthquake in Upper India, 377—on the Malabar coast, 391—at Dacca, 509.

East-India House, goods declared for sale at, 146,286,413,568,710,841—appointment of a new treasurer and deputy treasurer at, 411—election of Directors at, 707—see also Debates.

Edinburgh, donations from India to the Royal Society of, 226.

Edvisi, discovery of a manuscript of, 806. Education, exertions making at Calcutta in the cause of, 261—state of, in Southern India, 616.

Egypt, observations on the route to India by, 40—modern improvements in, 355.

Egyptian Antiquities, notice of M. Riffaud's collection of, 143.

Elephants, Burmese mode of taking and taming, 229—hunt for, in Ceylon, 700.

Elphinstone (Hon. M.), respectful sentiments of the native community of Borrbay towards, 392—bis character as drawn by Bishop Heber, 621—bust of, to be placed in the rooms of the Bombay Literary Society, 659—government honours to, 690—numerous addresses presented to him on his resigning the Government of Bombay, 695—entertainment to, 698—statue of, 833.

Erskine (Mr.), of Bombay, case of, 452, 779.

Exchanges, rates of, at Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Singapore, and Canton, 118, 280, 404, 568, 705, 835.

Farquhar

F.

Farquhar (Mr.), yalidity of his will ques-tioned, 143,

Festivals, Hindu, account of,-the Cherck Puja, 32-the Dol Jatra, 102-the Snan Yatra, 230-the Naga Panchami, 324 -the Rama Leela, 612.

Ficus Indica, in Guzerat, account of, 231. Fire at Buitenzorg, 396-at the Jaun Bazar at Calcutta, 682.

Food, diversity of taste respecting, 663. Fræhn (Dr. C. M.), review of his work on Oriental Coins, 478.

France, state of Oriental literature iu, 326. Freebooter, romantic conduct of, 371.

Futtehgurh, entertainment at, 258.

Ganges, great rise of, at Benares, 515. Gardner (Lieut. Col.), complaints against,

General Orders by the Indian Governvernments-see Calcutta, Madras, &c. Ginseng of Nepal, account of, 493.

Glasgow, trade of, with India, 143.

Gold in the Irawadi, 679-mine discovered near Malacca, 701. Goods declared for sale at the East-India House, 146, 286, 413, 568, 710, 841. Grame (H. S.), appointed acting governor of Madras, 105.

Greece, policy of Turkey towards, 751. Grindlay (Capt.), notice of his 'Views in India,' 410.

Guthrie (Mr.), letters from, written dur. ing his travels in Upper and Central Asia, 157.

Guzerat, state of the crops in, 393.

H.

Haileybury College, examination at, in December 1827, 58.

Hamilton (W.), review of his East-India Gazetteer, 345.

Harington (Hon. J. H.), character of, as an Oriental scholar, 60-leaves India for Europe, 100 -death of, 709.

Hastings (late Marquess), monument to be crected to his memory at Calcutta, 97, 258-ceremonial observed at Lucknow on the death of, 367.

Hay (Ens.), drowned near Buxar, 263. Heath (Assist. Surg.) drowned near Howrah, 263.

Heber (Bishop), remarks upon the letters of, 367-characters of public men in India, drawn by, 621-review of his ' Narrative of a Journey in Upper India, High places, on the holiness of, 313.

Hindoostanee language, early study of, recommended to youths destined for India, 155-identified with the Irish. 354-remarks on its structure, 637.

Hindu history of Cashmere, 22-law of marriage, 43, 166-superstition, 98, 495-morals, 162-system of benevolence, 165-festivals, 32, 230, 354, 612-drama, 289, 417, 585-duties of women, 339-devotional orders, 441duties of kings and rulers, 443-converts, 509-antiquities, 511-aphorisms,

Hindus, intellectual character of, 713

Hindu histories (original), remarks of M. Abel Rémusat on, 22.

Hooghly River, introduction of steamtugs in, 373.

Hospitals for animals in India, 663. Hutchings (Rev. R. S.), tribute to the memory of, 113.

Huderabad, fête at, 273. Hudrophobia, remedy for, 494.

India, observations on the route to, by Egypt and the Red Sea, 56-theism in, 311-hospitals for animals in, 663-remarks on the constitutions best suited to the climate of, 742-chronology of the history of, 806.

India (British)-expenditure of the presidencies of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay from 1793 to 1826, 161-account of the territories in the Deccan, 188, 318-account of Malabar, and other provinces to the south, 195-mission from the Governor General to Runjeet Singh, 264-further particulars respecting the mutiny at Mominabad, 272account of the provinces conquered from the Burmese, 345-conversion of the natives, 353-improvements, 374new Board of Commissioners forthe affairs of, 410-further donation to the troops employed in the Burmese war, 499-petition to Parliament for the equalization of the duties on East and West-India sugars, 506, 679-also for the removal of the restrictions on the resort of British subjects to India, 506, 682-account of the Tinnevelly mission, 509, 819-journal of a route through Mysore, the Coorg country, Canara, and Malabar, 603, 763-state of education in the province of Bellary, 616-characters of public men in, 624-observation on the introduction of native juries into the country, 679 - contributions for the Scot's Church, 708-observations of a native on colonization, 814-Madras revenue systems, 719-insurance of lives, 818-telegraphs, 819.

India (not British)-insurrection of the Afghan Musulmans against the Sikhs, 97, 263, 372, 516-curious document respecting this war circulated in Malwa, 376-local intelligence from Lahore, 372.

372, 516, 682, 820—appointment of a successor to the late Dowlut Rao Sindhia, 98—affray with Apa Saheh at Gwalior, 681—operations of a British force sent against the Rajah of Kolapore, 272, 387, 519—his insolent conduct, 391—disturbance at Jelalabad, 372—grand court held at Shahjebanabad, ib.—ceremonies at Jaypur, 373, 515—earthquake near Lahore, 377—insurrection at Jaypur, 681—operations of Zalim Singh, of Upanara, ib.—death of the King of Oude, 500, 511—conduct of his successor, 819, 820—military operations in Peshawer, 820—another affray at Gwalior, ib.

India (Netherlands) — operations of the Dutch forces against the natives in the interior of Java, 115, 116, 283, 396, 523, 834—new decree of the Dutch in regard to European planters in Java, 115—new disturbances at Padang, 116 —proclamation of Viscount Dubus de Gisignies to the people of Java, 279—new productions in Java, 396—fire at Buitentorg, 10.—seizure of the Carimons, 834—duties and commercial regulations, 16.

Indigo crops in Bengal, 263, 514, 680.

Irawadi, discovery of the source of, 202—remarks of M. Klaproth on the subject, 472—gold found in, 679.

Irish tongue identified with the Hindoostance, 354.

.

Japanese literature, notice of a collection of works in, 226.

Jaun Bazar destroyed by fire, 682,

Jaypur, ceremonies at, 373, 515—insurrection at, 681.

Jews in Bokhara, account of, 67—Syrian, 353.

Juries (native) in India, observations upon the introduction of, 679.

K.

Kamrup, account of the ancient Hindu kingdom of, 482.

Kamschatka, volcano at, 228.

Keeling Islands, new settlement in, 728.

Kenera, notice of an inscription found in the cave temples at, 349.

Konnedy (Lieut.), accidental death of, 511.

Kirgheez, surface of the steppe of, 210.
Kittoor, property captured at, declared to be prize, 111.

Klaproth (M. J.), review of his 'Memoir upon the Sources of the Brahmaputra and Irawaddi,' 472—remarks by, upon the keys or radicals in the Chinese language, 662.

Kolapore, British force ordered against, 272, 387—state of our relations with Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 150.

this state, 347—turbulent conduct of the Bajah, 391—unconditional surrender of the fortress and territory to the British power, 519.

Koonbees, names and attributes of some of the gods of, 192.

Kubbeesa, dispute amongst the Parsees at Bombay respecting, 277, 391.

L

Laing (Major), reported death of, 665.

Lakes, Asiatic, changes in some of, 15.

Lambton (Lieut. Col.), journal of a route by, through Mysore, the Coorg country, Canara, and Malabar, 603, 763.

Langlois (M.), review of his 'Monumens Littéraires de l'Inde,' 213.

Lapis lazuli said to exist in Russia, 63. La Peyrouse, fate of, ascertained, 495.

Lettuce, narcotic from, 62.

Linnæan Society, paper read before, 494.

Lion, miraculous escape from, 374.

Literary frauds, imputed, 432.

Lushington (Mr.) assumes the government of Madras, 519, 684—entertainment given by, 689—his exertions during the late storm at Madras, 68°.

7.5

M'Donnell (Lieut), fracas between, and Capt. Dalrymple, at Calcutta, 257.

M'Nughten (Capt.), review of his 'Annotations on the Mutiny Act,' 652.

Madras Government (General Orders of) -additional allowances to ship surgeons, 103-sense entertained by the Government of the services of Lieut. Morison, ib .- instructions in regard to trials and punishments by courts-martial, 104, 267, 826-eligibility of officers to become superintending engineers and civil engineers, 104-staff designations changed, ib .- eligibility of officers for employment in the survey department, ib. - censure on the conduct of Capt. Sheriff, ib .- practice of striking soldiers forbidden, ib.—acting governor, 105—rewards to native officers, 266 new regulation for vacating staff offices, ib .- proper designation of lieut. colonels commandant, 268-equipments of veterinary surgeons, ib. - services of the late Lieut. Col. Noble, ib .- contributions to the Military Fund, ib .- principle for regulating promotion of cadets, ib .- instructions to ship surgeons, 378 additional conductors of ordnance, 378-destruction of regimental records, ib .- ordnance staff allowances, ib .- system to be observed in sending discharged soldiers to England, 380-leave of absence to superintending engineers, ib. -further donation to the troops employed in the Burmese war, 499-me-ritorious conduct of Lieut. Col. G. Cadell, 518-suplyy of tea and sugar to 5 R troops, troops, ib.—coramand allowances, '844—additional superintending surgeons, ib.—new governor, ib.—suspension of Lient. Green, ib.—unmilitary style of dress of officers, 684, 827—allowance to surgeons, 685—designation of "Indo-Briton," ib.—superintendent general of vaccination, ib.—reward to a native officer, 825—new designations of non-commissioned medical servants, 826—staff allowances, 827—recruiting for regiments, ib.—courts-martial, 105, 380, 827—civil, ecclesiastical, and military appointments, 106, 269, 281, 381, 685, 828.

Madras (local occurrences at)—storm, 107 —assemblies, 385, 689—bachelors' fête, 286—revenue systems, 433—arrival of Mr. Lushington, 519—shipwrecks, 687—shipping arrivals and departures, births, marriages, and deaths, 109, 273, 282, 387, 520, 689, 829.

Madras, revenue systems at, 719.

Supreme Court—disinclination of the natives to serve on juries, 107—appointment of a counsel for paupers, 16.—action in trespass: the Rev. Fré Lawrence de Sassari, v. the Rev. Fré Baptiste and others, 385—equity suit Causey Chitty v. the Hon. Company and John Sullivan, 16.—suit in the goods of Capt. James Tagg deceased, 384—trial of Codundaraumen and others for the murder of Mrs. Bennett, 519.

— Wesleyan Missionary Auxiliary Society, eighth anniversary of, 273.
Makran, notice of a route through, 348.
Malabur, account of, 195—table of the general partition of, made by Cherrumal Perrnural, 201—journal of a route through, 603, 763.

Malacca—account of the settlement, 56—complaints of the landholders against the Chinese planters and brotherhood, 114—education, 395—discovery of a gold mine at Bukit Taong, 701—Orphan Chamber, 734—births, marriages, and death, 114, 279, 395, 702.

Malcolm (Sir John), assumes the government of Bombay, 520, 690—his character by Bishop Heber, 622—visits Poonah, 628.

(Sir Charles), appointed superintendent of the Bombay marine, 411. Manipur, temperature of, 677.

Manuscript, Chinese, found in a chest of tea, 182.—of Edrisi, discovered, 806.

Manuscripts, Oriental, plan for publishing them in England, 183, 312, 801.

Marriage, Hindu law of, 43, 116.

Mouritius—new professorship of botany at, 67—account of the saline chalybeate spring lately discovered in the island, 114—appointment of a new governor for, 284—picture of the island, by a missionary, 395—rigid enforcement of the navigation laws at, 396—births, 396, 835.

Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta, proceedings of, 61, 225, 351, 493, 659. Meidani, proverb of, 637.

Metcalfe (Sir C. T.), appointed a member of council at Fort William, 363 entertainment given by, to Lord and Lady Amherst, 818.

Menu, analysis of the code of, 43, 162, 337, 441, 772.

Mewar, account of the princes of, 655.

Mhow, relief of troops at, 238, 499—races at, 833,

Mill (Mr.), observations on his 'History of British India,' 596.

Missionaries, their labours in Turkey, 400 —in Southern India, 509, 819.

Monkey, marriage of, 356. Moon, unlucky day to look at, 496.

Moorcroft (Mr.), further particulars respecting, 157.

Moreau (Mr. C.), notice of his, 'Records of British Finance,' 144 — statement by, of the expenditure of the East-India Company, 161.

Moulmein, survey of the old channel at, 676—picturesque appearance of, 818.

Mountains, lofty, on the holiness of, 313.

Munro (Sir T.), statue to be erectedat

Madras to the memory of, 107, 270, 385—memoir of, 149, 344—plan to perpetuate his memory in his native place, 385—character of, by Bishop Heber, 628.

Murder, several cases of, at Penang, 278 —of a child, at Calcutta, 375—of several Chinese, at Calcutta, 676.

Mysore, journal of a route through, by Col. Lambton, 603, 763.

N.

Naga Panchami, festival of, 354.

Nana Furnevees, autobiographical memoir of, 656.

Nautical Notices—Port Raffles, 375—new shoal off Cape Direction, ib.—shoal off Luban Island, ib.—dangerous shoal off Algoa Bay, 403—spire buoy at the entrance of Bombay harbour, 522—Canning bank, 677.

Nepaul—prohibition against timber-cutters in, 100—the young Rajah of, allowed to commence his public career, ib.—departure of a mission from, for China, 263—written characters and classical writings of, 350—account of the ginering of, 493—woodcocks of, 495.

New South Wales—suggestions for the improvement of the colony, 28, 187—quality of the opium cultivated in, 230—newspapers published in Sydney, 232—plan to poison the natives, 280—act respecting Pyne (Capt.), curious inscription on, 620 respecting assigned servants, ib.—influenza, ib.—price of an estate, ib.—important law decision in regard to two sailors of the ship Cumberland, 401—trial of Dr. Wardell for a libel against the government, 703—colonization, 704—probable discovery of a lake or inland sca, ib.—births, marriages, and deaths, 402, 834.

Newspapers (English), exempted from certain charges in India, 263.

Newspapers (Indian native), extracts from —native superstition, 98—self-inhumation, 263—suttee, 264—conversion of the natives to Christianity, 353—romantic incident, 370—remarks upon the East-India House debates on concremation, 370—insurrection against Runject Singh, 97, 263, 372, 516—abandonment of relatives, 515—Christian morals, ib.—phenomenon in Kandeish, ib.—distraining for rent, ib.—cure for cholera, 679.

Nilgherry Hills, inconveniences to be met with in, 101—general and medical topography of, 225—invalid establishment on, 829.

Noble (Lieut. Col. J.), services of, 268, 386.

Nomilah, new theatre opened at, 102.

0.

Ochterlony (Sir D.), account of his character by Bishop Heber, 495, 624.
Opium, cultivation of, in Australia, 230

—new duty on, at Penang, 701.
Oriental works, plan for the publication of, in England, 183, 312.

Oriental Translation Fund, works accepted by, 801.

Oriental literature, state of, in France, 326.
Orthography (European) of Oriental tongues, proposed system of, 6.

Oude, death of the King of, 500—his character, 511—change of ministry at, 820.

P

Pacific Ocean, union of, with the Atlantic, 497.

Padries of Sumatra, laws of, 668.

Palambang prize-money, distribution of, 362.

Paris, prize subjects put forth by the Royal Academy of, 63—general meeting of the Geographical Society of, 144.

Park (Mungo), death of, 806.

Parliament, debates in—state of the law in regard to appeals from India, 404—law of real property in India, 525, 785, 836 petition from the inhabitants of New South Wales for popular representation a...1 trial by jury, 706—petition of Mr. Miles O'Reilly, ib.—trial by Jury-in India, 836—Insolvents in India, 837—expences of the Courts in India, 838.

Parliamentary Papers, extracts from — East-India trade, 658—tea, ib.—silk trade, 800—sugar and coffee, ib.

Parsees, dispute amongst, at Bombay, 277, 391.

Passengers of ships to and from India, 146, 285, 412, 566, 708, 839.

Penang (local occurrences at)—improvements, 113—tribute to the memory of the late Rev. R. S. Hutchings, ib.—suppression of the Gauette, 278, 701—murders, ib.—establishment of a court of judicature for the incorporated settlements, 394, 523—desertion from a Company's ship, 523—civil and military appointments, 701—new duty on opium, ib.—births, marriages, and deaths, 113, 395, 523, 701, 833.

Pensions, military, proposed alterations in the method of paying, 258.

Persia—capture of Erivan by the Russians, 116—entrance of the Russians into Tabreez, ib.—preliminaries of peace, 142—interview between Prince Abbas Mirza and General Paskewitch, 279—renewal of the war, 522—Persian account of the late operations, 524—Russian manifesto announcing the conclusion of a treaty of peace, 702—anecdote of the late Shah, 231.

Persian Gulf—outrage on the British resident at Bushire, 99—expedition fitting out by the Imaum of Muscat against Mombas, 309—war between the Turks and the Chaub tribes at Bussorah, ib.—fracas between Capt, Betham and the Sheikh of Bushire, 400.

Phenomenon in Kandeish, 515-at Van Diemen's Land, 663.

Poetry—The Complaint, 14—True Love, 194—Calcutta, 303—Lost Gaiety De Bombay, 393—Sonnet by the late Nawab of Oude, 435—Ode by Koodiut, 465—the Fall of Seville, 615—Ode from Hafez, 640—Description of Babylon, 737—Song of Jaya Deva, 741.

Port Raffles, new colony at, 375.

Press (Indian), insensibility of the natives to the importance of, 515.

Prices-Current of East-India produce 148, 288, 416, 584, 712, 843.

Privy Council, appeals from India heard before—Ruttonjee and another v. Cawasjee, 408—Mullick v. Mullick, 409 —White v. Cleghorn, 707—Nauchier v. Setuputty, 721.

Proverb of Meidani, 636.

Publications, new, and works in the press, 356, 498, 668, 799.

Pyna (Capt.), curious inscription on, 620.
Races

R.

Races at Calcutta, 821-at Mhow, 833. Rain, average fall of, at Bombay, 355. Rama Leela, festival of, 612. Ramnad Case, appeal respecting, 721. Red Sea, observations on the route to India by, 40.

Review of Books-the Establishment of the Turks in Europe, 173-Appeal against the Indian Stamp Act, 221-Wilson's Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus, 289-Calcutta; a poem, 303 -Hamilton's East-India Gazetteer, 345-Bishop Heber's Narrative of a Journey through the Upper Provinces of India, 641-Macnaghten's Annotations on the Mutiny Act, 652-Brigg's Letters on India, 786-Lardner's Lectures on the Steam Engine, 794-Lockhart's Life of Burns, ib .- Shearman's British Gunner, 795-De George's Essays, ib.

Review of Foreign Books-Langlois' Mo-numens Littéraires de l'Iude, 213-Klaproth's Mémoire sur les Sources du Brahmapoutra et de l'Iraouaddy, 472-Freshn on Oriental Coins, 478-Lettre de Tutundju-Oglou-Moustafa-Aga, 790 -Græfe's Antiquitatis Græcæ et Romanæ Loco quædam e Rossorum lingua et usibus illustrata, 793.

Robberies at Bombay, 277.

Rockets, Parlby, partial failure of, 100. Rope Bridges, in India, 678.

Rouble, Russian, origin of the name, 68. Runject Singh, insurrection of the Af-ghans against, 97, 263, 372, 516-duplicity and fraud of, 159-mission from the Governor General of India to, 264local movements of, 372, 516, 682, 820. Russia-progress of the war against Persia, 116, 142, 279, 523, 702-intrigues of the Russians in Central Asia, 158their increase of power in that quarter, 494-progress of science in, 436.

St. Helena (Island of), new governor for, 411-military appointments at, 118birth and death at, 118, 403.

Salm m (Miss), drowned, 514. Sandoway, medical topography of, 351.

San-luen River, excursion up, 633.

Scott (Lt. Col.), biographical notice of, 520. · (Lieut.) dismissed from his Majesty's service, 69, 411.

Securities, Indian, prices of, 118, 280, 404, 568, 705, 835.

Serampore, secession of Mr. Swan from the missionaries at, 816.

Serpent, worship of, 36.

shamanism in Siberia, 663.

Shipping, notices of loss of the Spring, Hayne, off the coast of Hants, 146-loss of the John, Dawson, in the Bay of Bengal, ib .- loss of the Dutch schooner Swift, Symons, near the island of Rodrigues, ib .- accident to the Buckinghamshire at Singapore, 278-perilous situation of the General Palmer off Portsmouth, 284-loss of the Loretto, Thomson, near Carimata, 285-loss of the Hussaren, Gibson, on the Sandwich Sand, ib .- accident to the Claudine, in the Queen's Channel, ib .- desertion of a boat's crew from the Farquharson, 523-loss of the Hope, Hill, Felicitas, Campbell, Security, Ross, and Davill Malcolm, Messiter, all in Madras Roads, 687-loss of the Shah Byramgore, Crockatt, among the Laccadive Islands, 699. Ships trading to India and eastward of the Cape of Good Hope, 144, 285, 414, 582, 841—East-India Company's of the season, 1827-28, 147, 287, 415, 583, 711, 842—cargoes of, lately arrived, 146, 286, 414, 568, 710, 841-ordered to be built at Bombay, 392.

Siam, journal of a residence at the capital of, 9-ratification of the late treaty with, 258-affairs at Bankok, 259.

Silk-worm, introduction of, at the Cape of Good Hope, 144.

Sindhia, successor to, 98, 372, 681.

Singapore (local occurrences at)-encouragement to the cultivation of spices, 113-disturbance amongst the Chinese, 113, 278-accident to the Buckingham-shire, 278-destruction of Pariah dogs, 395-meeting of the Raffles Club, ib. -seizure of the Carimons by the Dutch, 834-births, marriages, and deaths, 279, 523, 702, 834.

Smith (Judge) suspended from his office in Bengal, 138, 572.

Snake-catchers in China, account of, 497. Snan Yatra, festival of, 230.

Snodgrass (Maj.), strictures upon his ' Narrative of the Burmese War,' 821.

Spider, medical virtues of the web of, 61. Stamp Tax (Calcutta)—observations upon its introduction, 1—registration of the regulation by the Supreme Court, 73, 240-remarks of the Government Gazette on its registration, 256-the subject brought before a Court of Proprietors at the East-India House, 127, 577 -appeal to the English nation against, 221-proposed appeal to the King in Council, 373-change in the management of the duties, 376-attempts of an informer under the tax, 513.

Stamp Tax (Bombay), non-enforcement of 699.

Steam-engine, its resemblance to actual life, 228.

Steam-tugs in the Hooghly, 373. Stephens (Mr.) assassinated, 283, 370. Stocks, daily prices of, 148, 288, 416, 784, 712, 843.

784, 712, 843. Storm at Calcutta, 98—at Madras, 107, 687—at Bombay, 698.

Sugar (East-India), petition of the merchants of Calcutta respecting, 506, 679. Sumatra—new disturbances at Padang, 116—anthropophagy amongst the Battaks, 448—laws of the Padries, 668. Suttee at Pateala, 264.

Т

Tahiti, religious revolution in, 705.

Tartary, natural history of, 495—excurtion into, 676.

Tea, virtues of, 340.

Telegraphs, effective state of, in India, 819.

Theatre, new, opened at Nomilal, 102—entertainments at Chowringhee, 375, 514, 817—at Bombay, 390.

Theism in the East, 341.

Tiger excursion at Doongul, 64—extraordinary exploit of a British officer against, 111.

Timoor Nama, manuscript copy of, 102.

Timur, history of, 329, 626.
Timurelly mission, account of, 509, 819.
Tod (Lieut. Col. Jas.), character of, 623.
Turkey, glance at the history of, 173—vaccination in, 356—destruction of Bibles cination in, 356—destruction of Bibles and oppression of converts in, 400—politics of, 466—its policy towards Greece, 751.

¥1

Unitarianism in India, 258, 617.

V.

Vaccination, curious fact respecting, 231
—extension of, in Turkey, 356.

Van Diemen's Land,—newspapers published in, 232—depredations committed by the bush-rangers and blacks, 280—value of imports during 1826, ib.—increase in the population, ib.—tax upon newspapers, 705—birthe, marriages, and deaths, 402.

Van Sandau (Capt.), accidental death of, 375.

Vizagapatam, grand fête at, 108. Volcano at Kamschatka, 228.

w.

Wallich (Dr.), excursion of, in the Ultra-Gangetic provinces, 100.

Whale, extraordinary appearance of the oil of a, 663.

Widows (Hindoo), jeu-d'esprit called forth by a petition against the burning of, 259—remarks upon the debates at the East-India House on suttees, 370.

Wilson (H. H.), analysis of his 'Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus,' 289, 417, 585.

Woodcock, curious species of, found in Nepal, 495.

Wynn (Hon. C. W. W.), prize writership offered by, 410.

Z.

Zoological Society of London, acquisition made to the institution, 226.

ERRATUM.-Page 707, line 29, place a colon after "6th December," and omit "to."

END OF VOL. XXV.

